Seed-sowers battle against paths

By ANN PETERS

An all-brick campus is not in store for our Southern Part of Heaven, even though construction on campus has been heavy in recent months, UNC Physical Plant employees said recently.

Between September 1 and mid-October—despite all of the construction—three tons of grass seed will be planted along with six tons of fertilizer to ensure better growth. These measures may keep students, faculty and guests from creating their own detours, as construction sites block conventional paths.

"People make the paths across the grass unconsciously," Gene Swecker, director of the UNC Physical Plant said. "We'd rather grow grass than paths. So we're going easy on the bricks."

Phil Hunnicutt, University forester, agrees that grass is more attractive than brick. "We try to keep areas as nice looking as possible," he said. "It is also a lot easier and less expensive to grow grass than lay bricks."

The grounds department has 60 workers including brick masons and landscaping professionals, to battle the construction chaos. One-third of the department is directly involved in keeping the lawns in shape through weekly mowing and edging. Green signs with messages to "Please save the grass" and "Keep off the grass" have been planted recently in areas where dirt paths were developing but where seeds had been planted.

"After years of walking, dirt trails are (established)," Hunnicutt said.

The only new bricked areas planned will be beside the Student Health Center and from Hinton James, past Ehringhaus to Boshamer Stadium. A walkway by Carmichael Auditorium has been completed recently.

Hunnicutt said that certain areas are hard to maintain, but that the grounds people don't have hard feelings. "They realize that the University is a home to the students for the next nine months. So they try to keep the areas as nice looking as possible," he said.

So if you see workers planting tiny grass seeds around campus, covering the area with straw to keep the moisture in, just take a little extra time and a few extra steps to walk along the brick path. Green grass is a lot nicer than red brick.

SHS committee to pick director from 4 finalists

The Student Health Service Advisory Committee will begin Tuesday final interviews with the four remaining candidates for the position of UNC Student Health Service director.

The four finalists are: Dr. Judith Cowan, University of Arkansas SHS director; Dr. Samuel S. Wright, Vanderbilt University SHS director; Dr. Paul Trickett, University of Texas SHS director and Dr. Joseph DeWalt, UNC director of sports medicine.

The SHS director position came open last spring when Dr. James Taylor resigned. Dr. James McCutchen and DeWalt have acted as co-directors since Taylor's resignation. Taylor is continuing to work at the SHS as a physician.

The advisory committee will make a recommendation to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Donald Boulton. Boulton then will make his recommendation to Chancellor Christopher C. Fordham III. He will submit the name to the UNC Board of Trustees for approval.

Throughout the selection process, students have been asked for input into the criteria for the final selection. Students serving on the advisory committee are Katherine Pointer, Gayle Doss and Andy Bill.

Student Body President Bob Caunders said Student Government is looking for someone with administrative experience to fill the position.

"The service's past directors have had a lack of administrative experience," Saunders said. "The new director must look at how the SHS is being financed."

"The credentials all look good at this point," Boulton said. "It's kind of nebulous right now, looking for a personality that fits with our own staff."

"University students and staff each will have a chance to react; we'll see how well they like us and how well we like them," Boulton said.

The final choice, Boulton said, should be made by Oct. 1, as soon as all the interviews are completed.

"Then it will be a question of 'How soon can you come?'" Boulton said. "With the spring resignation we had a late start in the market, which has made it hard. A person might not be able to pull up stakes until the first of January."

Fire at Blimpie's results in damage

A small storage room fire at Blimpie's sandwich shop broke out early Sunday morning and will close the Franklin Street restaurant for at least several days, a spokesman for the Chapel Hill Fire Department said.

No damage estimates were available and the cause of the fire had not been determined as of Sunday night, but Capt. Bobby Pendergraph said building damage was minimal.

The fire department received a call on the fire at 4:40 a.m. Sunday. The fire was put out within 30 minutes, and most of the damage was caused by smoke, Pendergraph said.

A restaurant spokesman was not available for comment at press time.
