

UNC freshman dies in climbing accident

Martin J. Wade, a freshman from Yorkshire, England, was killed Sunday in a rock climbing accident while on a weekend trip with the UNC Outing Club.

Wade, 18, was lead climber for the group at Hanging Rock State Park near Winston-Salem. He had successfully completed the first part of a climb and was starting the second part when he slipped and fell approximately 90 feet to the base of the cliff.

Steve Borabeck, a member of the Outing Club and climb organizer said that Wade was an experienced climber. Borabeck said that lead climbers for the club's climbs usually were selected from people known to be good climbers within the club.

Wade, a Morehead scholar, had been in Chapel Hill for about three weeks and had discussed the climbs with Borabeck and the club's president, Windy Gordon.

A statement from the Outing Club said that Wade began the second portion of the climb before the others followed him had completed the first. By climbing on before the others assembled, Wade became a solo climber, an uncommon practice because of the danger involved. It was during that part of Wade's climb that he slipped and fell.

Wade, a graduate of the public high school Radley College in England, is survived by his parents Mr. and Mrs. John Frank Wade.

A memorial service for Wade was held Tuesday.

Martin Wade

Mebane Pritchett, executive director of the Morehead Foundation, said Wade's death came as a great shock to him. "After only three weeks in this country and at Chapel Hill, he had made many friends and seemed very happy in his new environment," he said. "In the short time I knew Martin, he impressed me as a very intelligent young man, a natural leader."

Black star won fame with style

By TOM MOORE Staff Writer

Sidney Poitier's cool and stylish acting style allowed him to break the Hollywood color line and become the first real black movie star. Before him blacks in Hollywood were regimented into embarrassing roles. Talented performers like Paul Robeson (with the exception of The Emperor Jones), Eddie "Rochester" Anderson, Hattie McDaniel, Stepin Fetchit and Mantan Moreland ended up playing stereotypes rather than act in Hollywood at all. There was a small independent black cinema in this country from the 1920s

Sidney Poitier stars in Lilies of the Field ...later won an Academy Award for his role until the 1950s but the films were cheaply made and had few outlets for distribution. So most black actors ended up playing offensive parts until Poitier brought real black characters into mainstream Hollywood.

The Carolina Union film committee presents three of Poitier's best films starting with Lilies of the Field, at 8 p.m. today. In Heat of the Night at 7 p.m. Sept. 24 and Let's Do It Again at 7 and 9:30 p.m. Oct. 1. All the films will be shown in Carroll Hall.

It's become somewhat chic to degrade Poitier's work in the 1950s and the 1960s as Uncle Tomish. And perhaps this view holds true for some of Poitier's earliest roles in such films as No Way Out and The Blackboard Jungle. Those were the only kind of parts available at that time for a black actor, and such parts were an improvement over the ways blacks had been depicted just a few years earlier.

As things progressed socially for blacks, the roles in films became less morose and more realistic. The parts Poitier got in films like A Raisin in the Sun and The Defiant Ones, though politicized somewhat to make a statement, were fairly well-written.

Poitier won an Academy Award in 1964 for his part in Lilies of the Field, the story of a jovial ex-GI who gets coerced into helping a group of nuns build a chapel.

Lilies started Poitier on his biggest wave of success in the movies. He starred in such other popular films as Guess Who's Coming to Dinner and In the Heat of the Night, which won Academy Awards for Best Picture and Best Actor (Rod Steiger) in 1967.

After it his career began to wane. Poitier became an anachronism of sorts in the early '70s when audiences went in droves to films like Superfly, Shaft and Blaupunkt.

Poitier revitalized his career with a comedy he both directed and starred in, Uptown Saturday Night. He later directed and starred in an equally successful sequel, Let's Do It Again, which features Poitier and Bill Cosby as two fellows who set up Jimmy Walker in a boxing match.
