'The Alchemist' resumes print

The Alchemist, the UNC science magazine, will be published again this semester after a two-year absence.

"The Alchemist is a unique science publication designed to make science enjoyable reading," editor Allison Essen said. The articles are on current topics and are written in language that any student can understand, she said.

"Some of our popular extras include math puzzles, book reviews and science fiction stories."

The magazine stopped publication after it was involved in a copyright controversy two years ago.

"We were budgeted for last year," Essen said. "Unfortunately, last year's editor just didn't get a staff together."

The Alchemist staff isn't anticipating any problems this year but is still looking for writers and artists, she said. They also encourage any professors doing research to submit a brief on their experiments before publication deadline Sept. 30.

Moliere play opens tonight at Playmakers

By BOB ROYALTY
Staff Writer

David Glenn looks very comfortable in his crowded office full of discarded sketches, a drawing table and hundreds of books. Glenn, assistant professor of drama at UNC, is the designer for the Playmakers Repertory Company and the technical director for the drama department.

Anyone who has been in Paul Green Theatre recently or who plans to go see the UNC Department of Dramatic Art's The Would-Be Gentleman starting tonight at 8 p.m., will immediately notice Glenn's latest creation—a large, authentic-looking chandelier. It dominates the entire theater.

The chandelier looks as if it were constructed of real crystal but is in fact plastic, steel and beads. The beads were the only part which had to be purchased. The rest was crafted completely by hand by Glenn and his staff. A real chandelier would have cost around $5,000; this cost less than $500. "I took a mold from a real candelabra and cast it in latex. This is in no way real."

"It was a lot of fun to do—I'd say it's one of the most difficult decorative things I've ever done," Glenn said.

The chandelier hangs from the ceiling over the center of the Paul Green thrust stage. "It's one of the focal points of the stage, setting the feeling and drawing attention to the center,"

David Glenn's handmade chandelier...for The Would-Be Gentleman

Glenn said.

Making this complex chandelier was not easy. "It's very repetitious. There are 16 arms and each has the same pattern of crystals."

Glenn's Baroque set creates the proper mood for Moliere's The Would-Be Gentleman. The play is about a vain, middle-class man of the 17th century who tries to act like a nobleman. He is in fact wealthy and his many tutors take advantage of him on the road to glory.

The Would-Be Gentleman is "a satiric farce which takes stabs at social pretensions," director Tom Rezutto said. Like Moliere's other plays the cast uses stereotypes of people: the maid, the miser, the nobleman, etc. Rezutto said, "What we are trying to do is a performance" rather than an historically authentic recreation of Moliere.

The all-student cast features Nicholas Searcy as Cleonte, Laura Sumner as Lucile, Alana Teichman as Dorimene, Thom Gillot as Dorante and Charles Greer as M. Jourdain.

N.C. Symphony concert canceled

Due to a strike by North Carolina Symphony musicians, the concert scheduled for today at 8 p.m. in Memorial Hall has been canceled.

Orchestra members went on strike Friday at midnight after a 63-1 vote. They are demanding the symphony administration make more concerted efforts to stimulate the orchestra's future growth.

"We are concerned that we have the highest possible artistic product that can be available for the people of North Carolina," David Lewis, a spokesman for the orchestra committee, said.

A longer concert season, expanded orchestra membership and accelerated fund-raising activities are among the proposals.

Symphony musicians asked for a 13 percent weekly pay increase and for a 52-week season. Members presently receive at least $325 a week during a 40-week season. The proposed increase would hike the minimum annual pay from $13,000 to $19,097.

Orchestra trustees maintain that this increase would further strain an already troubled budget.

The musicians have been working without a contract since June.

"No official negotiations have taken place at this time," said Mary Stewart

Hood, a spokesman for the symphony's public relations office. "We just hope it will be resolved as soon as possible."

Orchestra musicians will perform their annual free pops concert at 5:30 p.m. Sunday in Forest Theatre as free agents to publicize their cause.

According to Hood, refunds on tonight's tickets will be offered as soon as a system has been worked out with the State Auditor's office. Ticket holders are urged to save their tickets, since they must be presented to obtain refunds.
