

Strike over, symphony plays again

By FRANK ZANG
Staff Writer

The North Carolina Symphony gave its first performance Sunday afternoon since an agreement was reached in a week-long strike. The symphony performed in Memorial Hall for an almost-full house.

The members initially walked out Sept. 19, protesting the policies of the symphony's board of trustees concerning orchestra size, season expansion, and wage and benefits improvements. Under the new agreement, symphony members will receive a 35 percent pay increase over the next three years, a possible four-week summer season in 1983 and a voice in the selection of the next conductor.

"Naturally, I think that we made the gains necessary for the growth of the orchestra," said Jimmy Gilmore, principal clarinet player. Gilmore said he believed that no one would be completely happy with the agreement but that the publicity generated by the strike would make people more aware of the symphony's situation.

The musicians approved the new contract by a 55-8 vote.

Martha Aarons, principal flute player, said she believed the strike was "short people to the concerts.

"I had planned to go to the concert earlier because of the music selection but the publicity adds a little extra incentive," said UNC sophomore Steve Wilson.

Rutha Beth Marsh, a Chapel Hill resident, said, "We had planned to come months ago so our children could come." She said she believed the free concert provided a good opportunity for the whole community.

Gilmore summed up the feelings of the symphony players when he said, "If interest is there for great music, the people will be there."

enough to help us and not long enough to hurt us." She said the strike succeeded in raising public consciousness and helped to inform the board of future improvements.

"It can be a real exciting year and hopefully committed to more growth," Aarons said.

Rutha Beth Marsh, a violin player in the orchestra, said she hadn't liked the prospect of an extended strike and was optimistic about the future. Marsh said the strike provided "a step in the right direction to increase (lengthen) the season."

The symphony players said they hoped the strike publicity would bring more

B-52's enter a plastic suburbia

By JORDAN HAWLEY
Staff Writer

Like many of their kind, the B-52's have more in common with Chuck Mangione and Barry Manilow than most Carolina political poggers realize. The former plays for suburbia, and the latter plays with suburbia—the middle class Cordoba mentality is essential to each form.

The B-52's latest, Wild Planet, immediately invites you into the plastic luxury of an Athens home on a Saturday night with the track, "Party Out of Bounds." "Surprise! Hill! We just thought we'd drop in....OK, who ordered pizza?"

No doubt, the images are familiar enough and most will have no trouble filling in the rest of the sketch. Someone is watching HBO, while the rest party down to Mad Love. But the band doesn't insult your intelligence and does leave something to the imagination.

Unlike last year's model, the 1980 edition of the B-52's has produced some beautiful sounds which vary from the erotic "Devil in My Car" to the attractively hollow, neo-Eno sound of "Give Me Back My Man."

This refinement in their sound is due largely to the expanded female vocals which contributes significantly to the accessibility of Wild Planet.

At the same time, the flat Mel Blanc voice which you may remember from last year's irritating "Rock Lobster," fulfills its role more effectively in the cut "Quiche Lorraine." It's Bound to be a classic on the Hill by next November.

If you gave up on the article and skipped to the end, here's the diagnosis. The B-52's have succeeded in developing their suburban style without selling out to L.A. overkill a la Peter Asher. Buy Wild Planet.

Hair Fitness TIPS:

Travel Tip: Condition your hair just before you fly to minimize high-altitude dryness.

Shampoo as soon as possible after swimming. Oily hair may have to be washed more often than usual, since heat activates oil glands. Use a mild shampoo, lathering only once.

The best defense against dryness from chlorinated or salt water, and sun damage is constant protection. Try combing your conditioner through your hair.
