

Nursing professor from UNC testifies before subcommittees

From staff reports

A University of North Carolina professor appeared before two congressional subcommittees Tuesday as part of an effort to ensure a more comprehensive health care plan for young children and expectant mothers.

Dr. Katherine B. Nuckolls, professor and director of primary care nursing at the UNC School of Nursing, is the only nursing representative on the 17-member Select Panel on Child Care.

Panel recommendations included improvements in private health care plans and establishment of a national plan for maternal and child care insurance. The panel also urged better implementation of maternal and child care knowledge.

"The actions that need to be taken are in terms of health promotion, disease prevention and family education," Nuckolls said recently in Chapel Hill.

She said panel members were concerned that the quality of prenatal health care depended on ability to pay. "Health care has to be accessible and available to everyone. Basic services should be available to everyone equally without cost," she said.

Nuckolls said cost efficient care was possible through strengthened insurance programs and through the creation of a maternal and child health administration within the U.S. Public Health Service.

Though the recommendations come at a time when budget-cutting is popular, Nuckolls said the program was efficient enough to win approval from the newly elected Republican Senate.

"If you look at the cost of one case of mental retardation compared to the cost of early care to prevent that retardation, you've got a bargain," she said.

The panel also recommended a stronger school nurse program, as well as a network of nurse practitioners to work with families.

"The panel recognizes that the family is the primary source of health care for children, and it feels strongly that the health care system must recognize and support the family," Nuckolls said.

Dr. Howard Jacobson, director of the Institute of Nutrition, served as senior nutrition consultant to the panel. In addition, Dr. Barry Popkin, assistant professor of nutrition, and Dr. Mildred Kaufman, associate professor of nutrition (both of the School of Public Health), prepared a major background paper on nutrition for the panel.

The panel was formed in 1978. Its members were appointed by the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. It includes representatives from science, medicine, dentistry, allied health professions, nursing, mental health, preventive health and education.

Dormitories, Granville to close over Christmas

University Housing and Granville Towers East and West will be closed for Christmas break at 6 p.m. Thursday, Dec. 18, the last day of exams. They will reopen for second semester at noon Sunday, Jan. 11.

The University Housing Office has advised students to lock all doors and windows, unplug all appliances, except refrigerators and turn off all lights before leaving. The Housing Office also recommended that students take home their televisions, stereos and cameras over Christmas break. The buildings will be locked, and students will not be allowed in during the break.

Any student wishing to stay on campus over Christmas break will be able to stay in the lounges of Craige dorm for $3 a night. Reservations can be made by calling the University Housing Office at 933-5406 by 5 p.m. Dec. 15. Reservations will be offered on a first-come, first-serve basis. Check-in for people staying in Craige over Christmas break will be from 4-9 p.m. Thursday, Dec. 18 and from 5-8 p.m. Friday, Dec. 19. The Craige office will be open from 5-9 p.m. Dec. 20 through Jan. 10 and will be closed Christmas and New Year's Day.

Granville-Towers-South also will be open! Christmas break! For more information about Granville openings, call the business office at 929-7474.
