

Deacs next test for Perkins

They are the most sought after item when the recruiting wars begin each year. Coaches have built teams around them and have turned programs from rags to riches. UCLA did it with Lew Alcindor and Bill Walton, San Francisco with Bill Russell.

North Carolina traditionally has worked the center spot differently — rotating several players in and out of the pivot. But this year the Heels — in one man — combine experience and youth at the post in a "rookie" who has turned in some stellar performances already.

Scott Peterson

Freshman Sam Perkins has seen only 16 games of collegiate action. He was highly recruited out of Latham, N.Y., and is almost certain to be another fine player on the list of Dean Smith's New York connection. A fine percentage shooter, Perkins leads Carolina from the field hitting 68 percent of his shots for an average of 15 points per game. He also leads the Tar Heels in blocked shots with 26.

As a rookie in one of the toughest basketball leagues in the country, Perkins already has been through the baptismal fires. Rugged early season scheduling matched the 6-9 center with some of the finest big men in the nation: Arkansas' Scott Hastings in the Great Alaska Shootout, Indiana's Ray Tolbert in a nationally televised contest, Louisville's Rodney McCray and Atlantic Coast Conference opponents Ralph Sampson of Virginia and Buck Williams of Maryland.

"Once in a while during the early part of the season I wasn't too relaxed or too confident about going out there and playing," Perkins said. "But as time went on it was just routine. I started relaxing and getting confident about going out there and playing every night."

"We played against teams I had never played before and players I had never played before. It was a great feeling after I got relaxed."

"My expectations coming into the program were to fit into the program and start off on a good foot. So far I have been doing that. Coach Smith keeps reminding me to work hard and things will go well. I've been working hard, and he's right, things have gone well."

Indeed, things have gone well. Perkins leads the league in field-goal percentage in ACC games and is the league's fifth top rebounder.

In an early season meeting with Rutgers in Charlotte, while the Scarlet Knights concentrated on stopping Al Wood and James Worthy, Perkins blistered the Rutgers defense with 30 points.

But, the Rutgers performance is in the past and Perkins must now direct his attention to nationally third-ranked Wake Forest in tonight's ACC matchup in Winston-Salem. The Deacons defeated Carolina 82-71 in the finals of the Big Four Tournament after leading by as much as 22 points.

"I think we are a better team now than when we met Wake Forest earlier," Perkins said. "That was in the Big Four and I was just learning new defenses and wasn't really relaxed out there."

"But going into the game Thursday night, I think it will be a different outcome because we are stronger on defense and execute more on offense. I think we are a totally different ball club than we were in the Big Four."

The Deacons, an experienced, physical squad, dominated the inside play in the December meeting in Greensboro. Even though the two teams had 32 rebounds apiece, the Deacs grabbed many of the key rebounds in the game. Guy Morgan's 14 rebounds are the most by a Carolina opponent this year.

"Wake Forest is a strong ball club with individual players that have good raw talent and just play well as a team," Perkins said. "My main thing since I learned the defense better is to contain (center Jim) Johnstone and wherever he is, to be in the way of where he wants to go. We will have to be on the boards because they are capable of rebounding well."

Perkins said that rebounds would be the key in the crucial matchup. "They have a good rebounding team," he said of Wake, 14-0 and 4-0 in the ACC. "The boards in this game will be critical. I think the game will come down to rebounds more than anything else."

If Perkins is to contribute against the Deacs, he must shake what may be the biggest snag in his game: fouls. He fouled out with more than seven minutes left against N.C. State and drew three fouls in a six-minute span in the first half against Duke.

Perkins' frustration with fouls has built over those two games. "I guess it's not the officials' fault," he said. "They call what they see and sometimes what they don't see. A couple of fouls I know I didn't touch the guy and it's just frustrating. That one more foul is so important. Once you are out of the game, that's it. Teams can come back and take advantage of me being out of the game."

Perkins' initiation takes another turn tonight in a game that marks the point in the ACC schedule when every game becomes critical. At that point, teams must begin to draw from any and all resources they have. And at that point, freshmen sometimes play like they've been in the league for years.

Brown paces Heels

Tresa Brown scored 18 points and grabbed 13 rebounds to lead the North Carolina women's basketball team to a 86-56 win over Appalachian State Tuesday night in Carmichael Auditorium.

Brown shot 7-of-10 from the field and hit all four of her free throws to lead the Tar Heels. Aprille Shaffer and Henrietta Walls also were in double figures for UNC with 14 and 13 points respectively.

Brown's 13 rebounds was also high for UNC. Walls added nine rebounds as the Tar Heels outrebounded ASU 51-38. "We didn't have a height advantage against Appalachian," UNC coach Jennifer Alley said. "We just did a good job getting inside position and boxing out on both ends of the court."

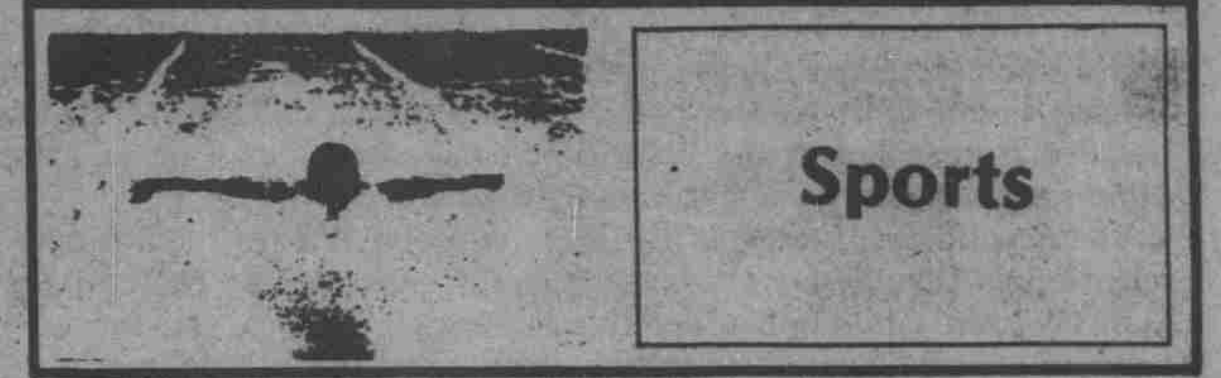

Carolina shot 50 percent in the first half as it ran out to a 47-24 lead at intermission. UNC cooled off a little in the second half, but Alley said she was pleased with the performance.

"With our rebounding we were getting three or four tries a possession," she said. "That brings the shooting percentage down, but you get the points."

The Tar Heels forced 31 ASU turnovers but gave the ball up only 16 times. "ASU came out pressing us," Alley said. "We did a good effort protecting the ball and passing to the open man."

Carolina is back in action quickly, going against powerful N.C. State at 7:30 tonight in Raleigh.
