Tar Heels, Wahoos: Round Three in Philly

By DAVID POOLE
Staff Writer

In its first three games of the 1981 NCAA college basketball championship tournament, North Carolina had to rely on a lot of scouting, because the coaches didn't know a whole lot about Pittsburgh, Utah and Kansas State beforehand.

There is no such problem for the next game.

There probably are very few people in the country who don't know by now that the Tar Heels will be facing Virginia in the national semifinals Saturday. The Carolina-Virginia game follows the match between Indiana and Louisiana State in the nationally-televised doubleheader from Philadelphia's Spectrum.

The game between the two Atlantic Coast Conference rivals should be a war. Much discussion this week has centered around the previous two meetings between the teams this year — both of them being Virginia wins.

In both the 63-57 Cavalier victory in Charlottesville and the 80-79 overtime win for Virginia here in Chapel Hill, the same pattern was repeated. In both games, the Tar Heels had big leads and both times the Cavaliers roared back to take the games.

"We played two of our better games of the year against Virginia, and they came back and won both of those games," North Carolina coach Dean Smith said Wednesday. "We just have to remember how well we played yet still lost."

Much talk has focused on whether the two regular season Virginia victories would have any effect on this game, which takes on a little more importance than did either of the two earlier meetings.

James Worthy said at a press conference Wednesday that he thought the regular season games would work to Virginia's advantage. Smith said at the same gathering that, if there was any advantage, he felt it belonged to the Cavs. Not surprisingly, Virginia coach Terry Holland said he thought the past would not be a factor.

But what the first two games between the teams this year will do, is give both coaching staffs a wealth of information from which to formulate strategy.

In the first meeting at Charlottesville in January, the Tar Heels built a 13-point lead in the second half before the Cavs began hitting every shot they put up. Even the Four Corners couldn't stop the Virginia rally as the Cavaliers set a record for Carolina opponents for points per possession in a half, and won the game.

When the Cavaliers came to Chapel Hill, a fired-up UNC team and crowd greeted them. The Tar Heels threatened to blow the Cavs out of the game, building up a 16-point lead in the second half.

But the Cavs came back again and cut the margin to eight before the Tar Heels went to a slow-down game. Jeff Lamp hit the shot that sent the game into overtime. Virginia won by a point in the extra period, and the game ended with a bench-clearing brawl that was nearly as intense as the game which had preceded.

The key for Virginia, of course, is Ralph Sampson, the 7-4 All-America center who was the ACC Player of the Year. Sampson had a great game in Chapel Hill against the Heels and has been a major factor so far in the tournament for Virginia.

Lamp was the Most Outstanding Player in the East Regional and continues to be a leader on offense for Virginia. He will most likely be joined at forward in the starting lineup by the rugged Terry Gates, because Lee Raker is still suffering from a thigh injury he sustained in the ACC Tournament.

The starting backcourt for the Cavaliers will be Jeff Jones, the playmaker, and freshman Othell Wilson. Wilson hurt Carolina both times the teams played earlier in the year, with excellent shooting in Charlottesville and great defense here. Wilson gained a starting role late in the season as Holland moved Lamp to forward and relegated Craig Robinson to a substitute role.

The Carolina staff is well aware of the problems the Virginia lineup presents. A team that concentrates too much on stopping Sampson risks letting Lamp and Raker beat it. But Sampson has to be controlled, though it is next to impossible to stop him altogether.

The coaching matchup of Holland and Smith is also an interesting one. Though the lack of love between the two is probably less intense than press and fans believe, it is no secret that Holland and Smith don't always see eye-to-eye.

Add to all that the fact that this game is for the chance to play either LSU or Indiana for the national championship, and it is easy to see that emotion is likely to be as big a factor as anything in the game.
