

honors

It was in 1936 that the first separate honor council was formed. The honor council would try "all reported violations of the honor principle." Those who were found guilty by the council were then sentenced by the Student Council.

Also in 1936 came the greatest crisis the honor system has ever faced, when the January 30 Tar Heel printed an article exposing a "system of organized cheating" — a ring which would write papers, themes and reports and take correspondence courses and exams for other students. Nearly 200 students, including some members of the Student Council, were involved in the affair and tried. Eventually, 52 students were found guilty and were suspended from the University.

Exum's report concludes that this shocking exposure strengthened the honor system in the long run by convincing the students of its benefits and advantages.

Ten years after the cheating ring was discovered came the most significant progress in the honor system after World War II — the adoption of a written constitution.

The Student Council was made into an appellate organization, with original jurisdiction in cases concerning men going to the Men's Council and cases concerning women falling under the control of the Women's Council.

A student found guilty under one of the two councils could appeal to the Student Council, which had the authority to call for a re-trial if they felt there were existing grounds for appeal.

In the late 1940s came the office of attorney general, who aided the student body president in investigating alleged violations and in judicial action before the councils.

In 1949 the responsibilities of instructors were recognized and stated as including a clear explanation of the values and obligations of the honor system, the maintenance of order, uniform procedure in the handling of violations and demonstration of the importance of personal interest, fairness and mutual consideration.

A measure referred to today as the "leniency bill" was introduced in 1955 that would make probation the normal punishment for first offenders, rather than suspension, as it has been for many years. It failed in the student referendum, however, which reflected the attitude on the part of the majority to keep a high degree of academic integrity at UNC.

The next year, 1956, saw the death of the old system of appeals and the birth of a new system. A Student-Faculty Appeals Board was established, consisting of three faculty members and the chairmen of the three major student courts — the Men's Council, the Women's Council and the Student Council.

Also in 1956, as a response to the growing belief that Honor Code and Campus Code violations should be handled separately, the Student Council gained the power to try alleged Campus Code offenses, while the Men's Council would deal with Honor Code violations. The Women's Council continued to retain jurisdiction over both types of violations with regard to women students.

The Men's and Women's Councils were to be combined into a single court in February 1958. Much debate followed this suggestion and a month later Student Body President Sonny Evans vetoed the bill and the idea was dismissed.

The idea of a jury system, with seven student jurors and two permanent jurors to comprise the jury for a particular case also arose in 1958, according to a report by Suzie Mitchell, a former Student Attorney General. A campus-wide referendum in 1959 resulted in four constitutional amendments, which granted students trial by a jury of peers.

However, in 1961, the jury system was abolished because it had not been successful nor well-liked, and in 1962 students were given the right to a public hearing, rather than a closed one, if they desired.

Many sweeping changes occurred in the judicial system during the 1960s, with some proposals abolishing changes made only months before, possibly reflecting the confusion and paranoia prevalent during the decade.

The first draft of The Instrument of Student Judicial Government was drawn up in 1970. Nearly twenty revisions and four years later, the final draft was approved and still stands basically unaltered today as the "Bible" of judicial affairs at Carolina.

The history of the honor system is a long one which finds its true roots in President Battle's proposal to adopt a system in which a signed pledge stating that a student had neither given nor received aid on the exam was a sufficient deterrent to academic misconduct. This is the general premise which, after more than a hundred years of alteration and evolution, resulted in the Honor System as it is known today.

News In Brief

Lebanon shaken in heavy fighting

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — The Syrian and Lebanese armies battled with artillery along Beirut's Moslem-Christian dividing line over the weekend, leaving at least 47 dead and 191 wounded and threatening to plunge Lebanon into a new round of civil war.

The Beirut police department gave the casualty figures for Beirut, and said they were in addition to the 102 killed and 300 wounded in the last four days in Beirut and in the Roman Catholic city of Zahle, where fighting erupted anew shortly after another truce collapsed late last week.

The fighting flared along all the traditional battlefronts of the 1975-76 civil war. Most of the fighting centered on a three-mile-long line separating Christian East Beirut and Moslem West Beirut.

President Elias Sarkis has contacted various sectarian leaders in an effort to head off a full-scale renewal of civil war.
