

Six Carrboro tracts remain industrial

By DIANE LUPTON
Staff Writer

The Carrboro Board of Aldermen voted Tuesday to allow six tracts of land zoned commercial and industrial to retain those designations instead of being rezoned residential.

A zoning change for a seventh tract and a proposal to change land near University Lake to a watershed zone, which would greatly decrease population density in that area, were referred to the procedures committee of the board.

Citizens who own the seven tracts and those who live in the area proposed for watershed designation raised objections to the changes, which were recommended by the Carrboro Planning Board.

H. Dobson Jr., who owns property in the area suggested for watershed designation, objected to requiring a five-acre lot for construction in that area. He said the N.C. Department of Human Resources only required a 40,000-square-foot lot with suitable soil for such an area. (An acre is 43,560 square feet.)

Dobson said the suitable soil requirement helped prevent problems with soil which did not adequately absorb water (percolate).

Wayne Lacoek, whose property is also in the proposed watershed zone, agreed with Dobson. "If an acre perks, it's not going to bother anything. You have to use common sense."

Orange Water and Sewer Authority Director Everett Billingsley and planning board Vice Chairman Miles Crenshaw said that heavy metals from additional development did much damage to the lake. Billingsley said OWASA used Environmental Protection Agency standards for the watershed requirements.

Crenshaw said the planning board had originally recommended an 18-month trial period for watershed zone, with a study following the trial period to determine the quality of the soil and to determine variable densities based on this analysis.

"A higher density reduces the soil available to absorb the undesirable chemicals," he said.

Billingsley said the protection of the lake was essential for the whole community and that the best defense for the lake was a pure water supply.

Property owners from the six disputed tracts and attorneys who represented them requested the zoning be left unchanged because of its ideal location for industry.

Howard Hearn, whose property on Fidelity Street still may be rezoned, said he wished his area to retain a neighborhood commercial designation.

Hearn had appeared before the board earlier this year in an attempt to get his property zoned so an ABC store could be constructed there.

Miles Fitch of Fitch Lumber said the change in zoning would affect the land on which his planer mill was located. He said the change would jeopardize the mill and asked the board to leave the zone as it was.

Only Alderman Steve Rose and Doug Sharer voted against allowing the six tracts to remain as they were. Both men said they wanted to wait, expressing a desire to have the board reconsider the requests and develop an overall policy for industry in Carrboro.

The public hearing on the watershed will continue at the board's May 12 meeting.

Former chancellor to leave teaching after long career

J. Carlyle Sitterson

As a Kenan professor and former University of North Carolina chancellor, Carlyle Sitterson is retiring effective July 1, thus ending 34 years of service to the University.

"The most rewarding thing I know of is teaching," Sitterson, who turned 70 this year, said. "I'll miss it."

Sitterson said he had to retire because University policy required faculty to do so at the age of 70. When faculty members reach 65, they are asked to continue serving on a year-to-year basis. Sitterson has been asked back five times.

He teaches 20th century U.S. history at both the graduate and undergraduate levels. He also taught western and Latin American civilization history.

A native North Carolinian, Sitterson was both a UNC undergraduate and graduate student. After college, Sitterson began teaching in 1932 at Georgia Military Academy. Twelve years later he became a full professor in the UNC history department. In 1955 he became dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and remained in this position until he was named dean of the General College.

He became vice chancellor in 1965 and served as chancellor from 1966 until 1972. He resigned this position to devote more time to teaching.

"I taught all the years I was in administration," Sitterson said. "I found that I couldn't sustain doing both things, and I decided I'd like to finish my career as a professor."

Sitterson's teaching excellence has been rewarded many times throughout his career. In 1954, students selected him as one of the 10 outstanding University professors. Then, in 1961, he was named a Kenan professor. Recently, he received a $1,000 award for his excellence in undergraduate teaching.

He was absent from teaching only twice — in 1942, when he entered the Army, and in 1944, when he served on the War Production Board.

Sitterson said he planned to do a lot of reading, along with research, writing and traveling. His next writing project will probably be about the University in the 1960s, since he was vice chancellor and chancellor during this time, he said.

He said he would stay in Chapel Hill and hoped to be a guest lecturer in the future.

"I plan to devote more of my time to my three grandchildren," Sitterson said. "I'll also play a lot of golf."

A history department spokesman said Otis Graham would take over Sitterson's position. Graham, who is presently teaching at UNC, previously taught at the University of Santa Barbara.
