State abortion funds required supplement

By SCOTT PHILLIPS
DTH Staff Writer

The state fund that pays for abortions for poor women fell short of funds for the third consecutive year and had to be supplemented with money from a program for mothers with dependent children, officials of the Department of Human Resources said this week.

The department transferred $233,300 from the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program when the State Abortion Fund needed more than the $1 million it was allocated by the General Assembly for fiscal year 1980-1981, department spokeswoman June Milby said.

A moratorium was placed on abortion funding May 15 for the remainder of the fiscal year after department officials announced that only $78 remained in the fund. The state's fiscal year ended June 30.

The extra money was needed to pay for abortions that were approved by county officials before May 15, but that had not yet been paid for. Counties are reimbursed with state funds for bearing the cost of abortions.

The money that was transferred came from funds the state had allocated to match federal grants for the AFDC program. The money was not needed last year and would have reverted to the general fund, Milby said. "This was a normal budget procedure for funds transfer," she said.

Using a strict set of guidelines, the abortion fund gives money to women whose annual income is not greater than $4,226. If they are members of a family of four, the family's income cannot be above $8,126. The program was set up so that a woman would not be discriminated against solely on the basis of income, Milby said.

The program provides up to $150 for a first-trimester abortion and up to $500 if the operation is in the second trimester.

Last year the fund paid for 5,730 of the state's approximately 32,000 abortions. Forty percent of the recipients were age 19 or younger, including four girls who were 10 years old.

Blood given for many reasons; some students give often

By LYNNE THOMSON
DTH Staff Writer

Russell Lookadoo gave blood for the 14th time at the Red Cross Bloodmobile in Great Hall of the Carolina Union Wednesday.

"It's just something I can do for somebody else; it doesn't set me back any," the Lewis Residence Hall resident assistant said.

Lookadoo's 14 pints may be more than the average donor has given, but repeat donors are very common, said Judy Crump, executive director of the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Red Cross.

"Students, once they give, tend to be repeat donors," she said. "They're very dedicated. They don't seem to mind standing in line."

One student said she was trying to give a gallon of blood as soon as possible. It is a personal challenge, she said.

She said another reason was so that she or a member of her family could get blood free if they ever needed it.

But this common belief is not true, said James Laney, vice president of APO fraternity, the organization in charge of blood collection on campus. Hospitals covered by the Red Cross give blood free of charge to anyone. But there is an administrative charge, Laney said.

That charge at North Carolina Memorial Hospital is $90 for the first pint of whole blood, $76 for subsequent pints.

Yvonne Marks, a first-time donor, said she was giving blood simply because she had always wanted to do it.

"I have one of the rare blood types," the Morrison assistant area director said. "I can help other people ... I might wind up helping myself for all I know," she said.

She said she was not scared of giving blood.

Marsha Hamilton, head nurse for the bloodmobile, said three or four of the approximately 200 people who gave blood in one day would feel light-headed after donating, from loss of blood sugar and liquids. APO provides soft drinks and cookies for the donors to replace these substances.

Hamilton said the nurses would have trouble finding the correct veins in about the same number of donors. But Crump estimated that 90 percent of the people who try to give blood are able to do so.

The people most often unable to give blood are women who are underweight or have low blood pressure or have too little iron in their blood she said. To give blood, one must be 17 and weigh at least 110 pounds.

APO is in charge of all blood collection on campus, but only sponsors the bloodmobile when it cannot find another group to do it, Laney said.

There will be about two bloodmobiles a month on campus this year.

The next will be Oct. 1 in Great Hall.
