Robert M. Miller, a professor in the history department, told the council that many people in his department were concerned about the present plan.

"We hope the resolution will evoke an informative and educational response," he said. "It might alert the General Assembly of our concern."

In another development, Fordham said before the council meeting that he was disappointed that some faculty members were upset over a speech delivered by UNC system Vice President Raymond H. Dawson during the University Day celebration earlier this month.

More than 50 faculty members signed a letter expressing their dissatisfaction with Dawson's speech, which addressed the UNC system's 11-year desegregation dispute and settlement with the federal government.

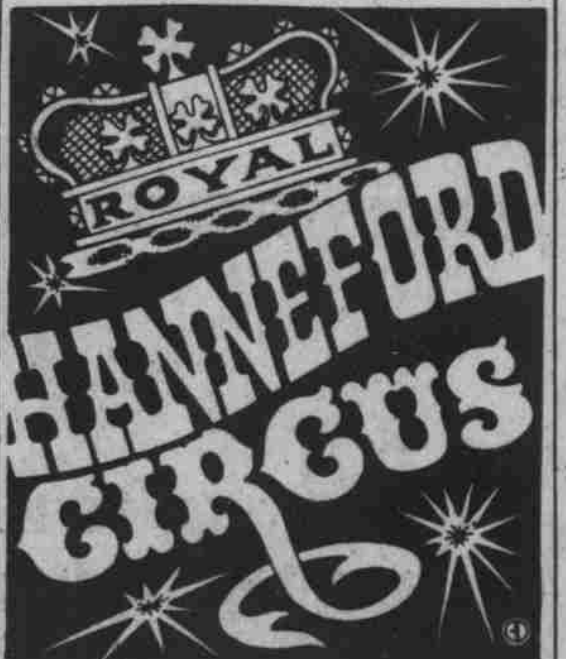

"The letter did not challenge his right to express his views," Fordham said. "It did express some unhappiness over the format."

Fordham said the letter was in good taste and that it was presented well.

"I'm always happy that the faculty would speak out," he said.
