

Three-fold increase in wrestling interest

Pinned by studies or end of the semester blues? Then take a break and watch the finals of the intramural wrestling meet at 4 p.m. in Woollen Gym.

The IM wrestling meet began with weigh-ins from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. Monday and the preliminary matches Tuesday afternoon. Assistant Intramural Director Marty Pomerantz said this year's meet had drawn more participants than meets in previous years had.

"There has been almost a threefold increase in participation," Pomerantz said. "This year's teams are getting points for participation, and because of this there are more participants."

Four years ago, wrestling was not offered as a point activity because not enough wrestlers entered from the graduate/independent category, he said. By giving each organization three points for each wrestler entered, the IM department hoped to generate more interest in the sport.

This strategy appears to have paid off with 121 wrestlers entered in 10 weight classes. The weight divisions range from 126 pounds to 190 pounds and more.

The IM wrestling meet is being run much like an NCAA meet. The main differences are the time limits for each period and the level of competition.

"The only dramatic difference is that each match is shorter," Pomerantz said. "There are three rounds, each about one and one-half minutes long, running time."

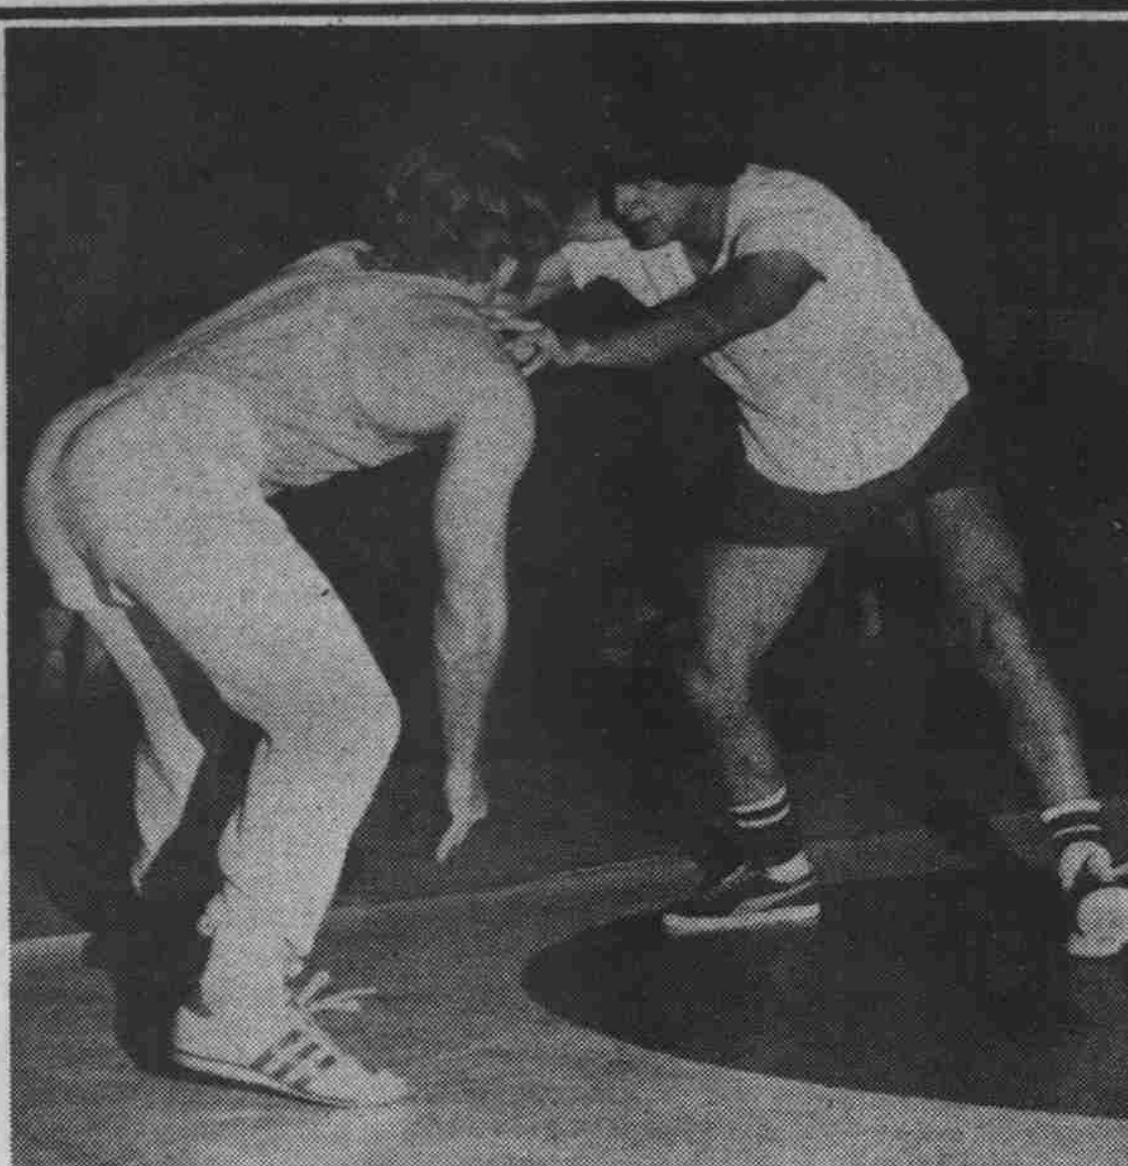

In NCAA competitive wrestling, one period lasts three minutes and the other two periods last two minutes, making for a seven-minute match, UNC wrestling team member Bobby Hill explained. Also, the clock is stopped when a wrestler goes out of bounds under NCAA rules, whereas the clock keeps running in intramural matches.

Members of the UNC wrestling team have helped call out and referee the matches each year for the IM department, and some of them said quality wrestling was not always present in the tournament.

"They don't train and prepare for the meet like we would, but they do the best they can," Hill said. "It (the meet) is like the high school level. Because of this we may be a little lenient on our calls. But the ones who have wrestled before are more serious, making the final matches tougher."

One reason for a lack of quality wrestling may be that many participants are there only for the points.

"Some wrestlers are strictly out there to get points," Pomerantz said.

Two IM wrestlers battle it out in last year's action ... this year's championship finals are at 4 p.m. today

"But they do get a chance to experience a new sport. It is one of the most demanding sports around."

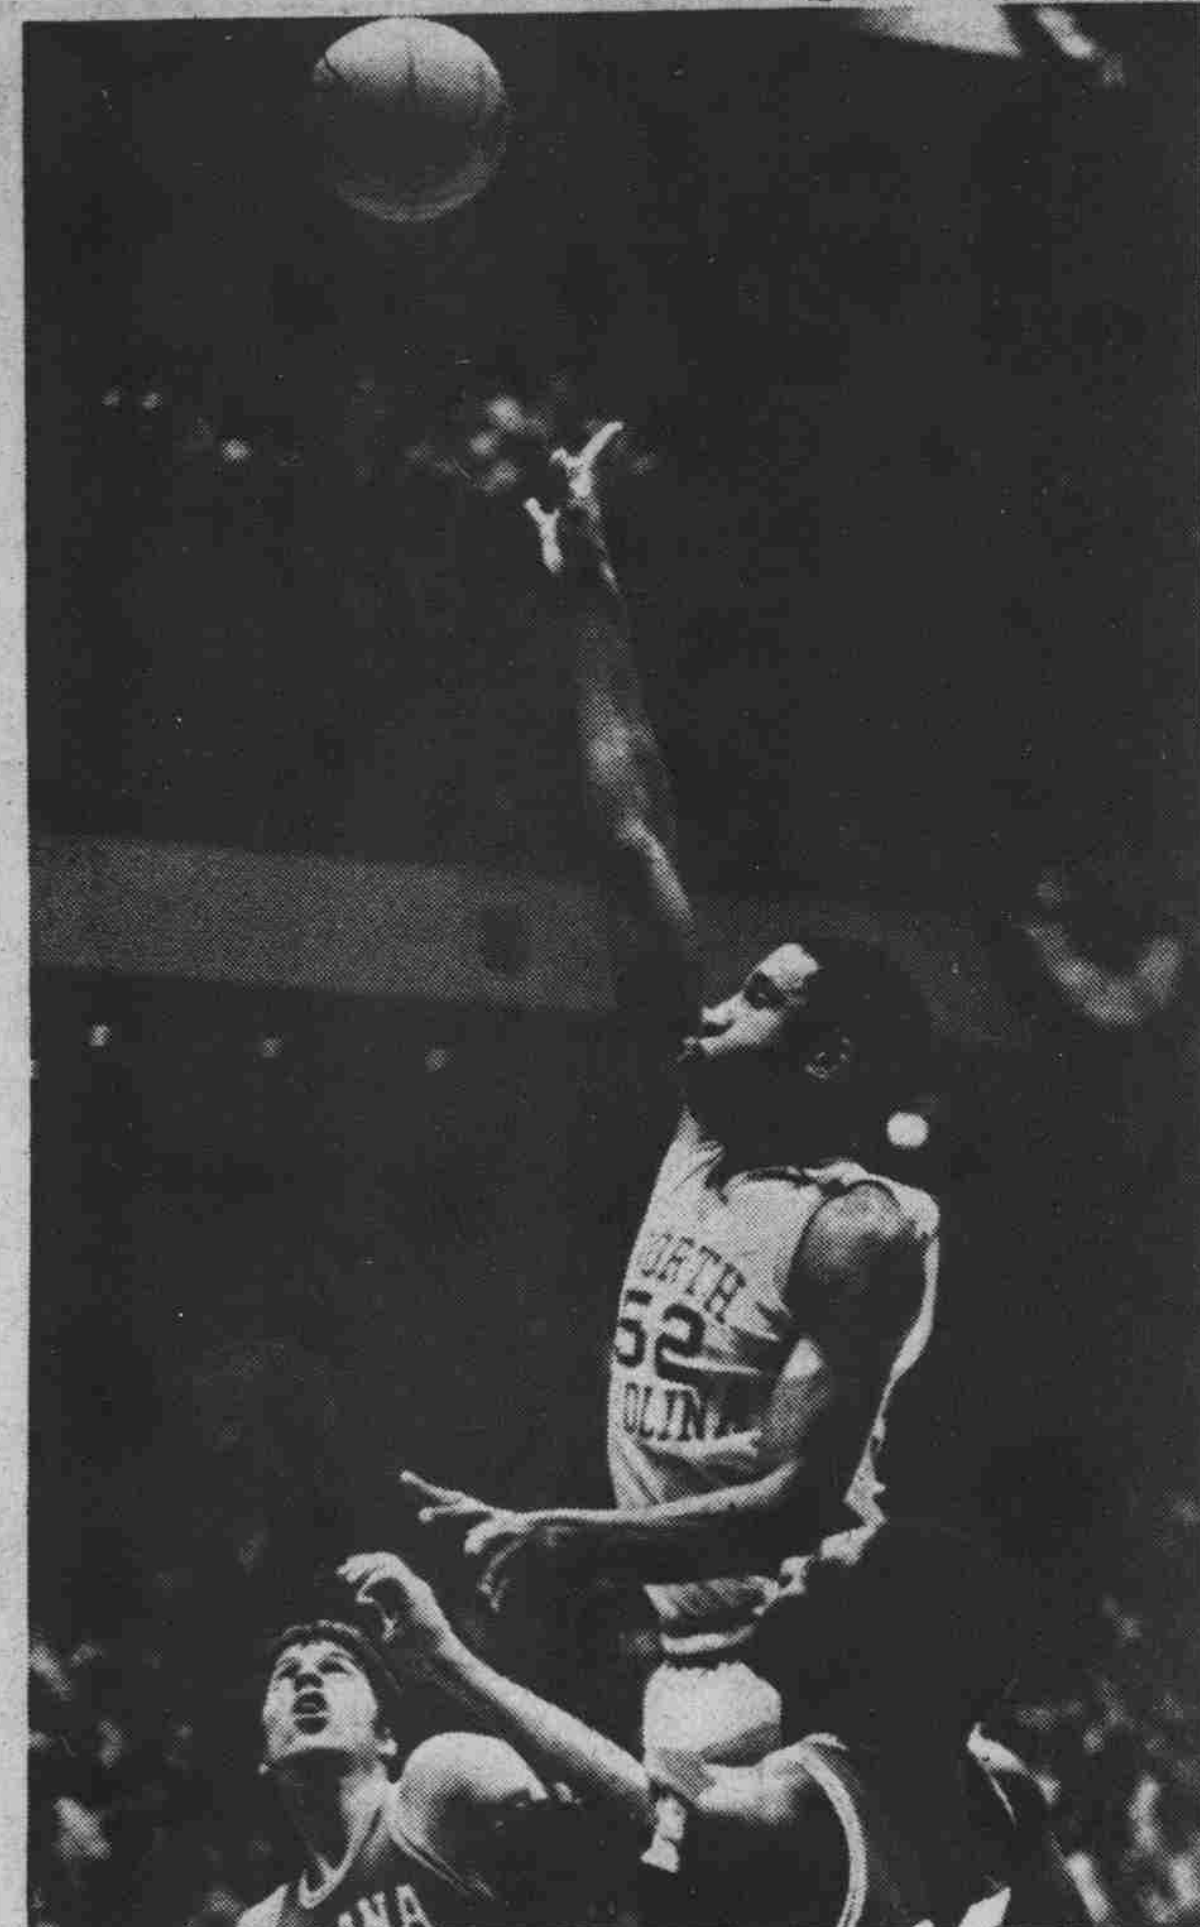

Although some may be out for the fun of a new challenge, UNC wrestler Steve Meis said the competition had improved over the years.

"Before joining the wrestling team, I competed in the intramural wrestling meet my freshman year," said Meis, the 1979 118-pound IM meet champion. "The competition is better this year. There are a couple of solid wrestlers who have had a lot of high school experience. The best ones will probably be the middle-weights in the finals.

"Overall, I was surprised to see such a large turnout and a lot of enthusiastic participants," he said.

Notes: Today is the deadline for entering the grail mural basketball tournament. Friday is the last day for entering the IM racquetball tournament. The annual Campus Y fundraising "Footfalls Roadrace" will begin at 12:30 p.m. Sunday in front of the Campus Y building on Cameron Avenue.

Worthy All-America

UNC basketball forward James Worthy has been named to Playboy magazine's All-America team. The December edition also lists Atlantic Coast Conference player Ralph Sampson of Virginia as a first-team player. The preseason coach-of-the-year is Georgetown's John Thompson, whose Hoyas are picked as national champions. UNC is second. North Carolina's Sam Perkins is an honorable mention selection.

Tar Heels lead conference stats

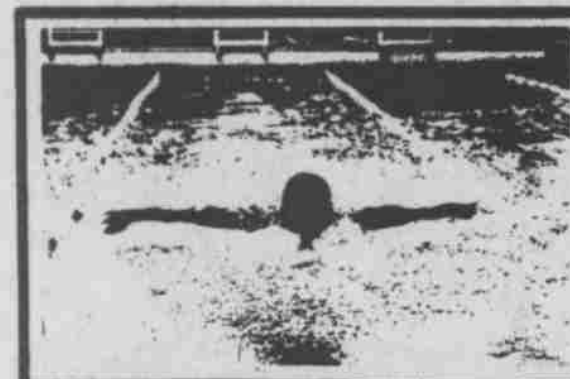

North Carolina and Clemson, getting set for Saturday's ACC showdown in Chapel Hill, led in six of 11 categories in statistics released this week.

The Tar Heels, ranked eighth in this week's Associated Press poll, led the conference in three of the four offensive statistics: total offense, rushing offense and scoring offense. UNC also leads the ACC in punting with a 41.9 average.

Clemson, ranked No. 2 in the AP poll this week, leads the conference in total defense and scoring defense. The Tigers have given up 257 yards and 7.7 points per game this season.

Clemson running back Cliff Austin is leading the ACC in scoring, sharing the lead with Duke's Cedrick Jones. Both are averaging six points per game.
