Chapel Hill man picked to head national humanities program

By JANE FOY
DTH Staff Writer

President Ronald Reagan officially announced Wednesday the nomination of William Bennett of Chapel Hill to head the National Endowment for the Humanities. Bennett is executive director of the National Humanities Center at Research Triangle Park. A spokesman for Bennett would not comment Wednesday about any of Bennett's specific goals for the agency, but said Bennett "wanted to do his homework" before announcing specific program ideas.
 Some had speculated that Sen. John East, R-N.C., might contest Bennett's nomination. East had been pushing M.E. Bradford, a conservative political theorist and English professor from Texas. But a spokesman for East said Wednesday that East would support the nomination.
 Jerry Woodruff, East's press secretary, said the senator preferred Bradford because of his reputation as a distinguished scholar and his work for the humanities as a member of Reagan's transition team.

 East was concerned that "Bradford get a fair hearing from the administration," Woodruff said, but he added that East would support Bennett if he was the man the administration believed would best fulfill the president's purposes.
 Bennett, formerly a faculty member at Boston University, has a law degree and a Ph.D. in political philosophy. He has headed the National Humanities Center since June 1979.
 The Center supports the research of scholars given temporary residence there and is financed by government grants and business contributions.
 If Bennett accepts the nomination, he will then go before the Senate for confirmation.
