Strategy to reduce public aid error adopted

By KELLY SIMMONS
DTH Staff Writer

A strategy to reduce high error rates in public assistance programs has been adopted by the North Carolina Department of Human Resources and county representatives, said Sarah Morrow, secretary of the North Carolina Department of Human Resources.

Morrow has been helping county social service departments in seeking more funds to provide eligibility workers for Aid for Families with Dependent Children, Food Stamps and Medicaid. Presently, the county departments determine eligibility for assistance programs. But high error rates reported by most of the counties in the state led Morrow to believe the departments had too much work to handle.

June Milby, director of public information for the state Department of Human Resources, said recently increased funding would provide more workers and reduce case loads.

Another burden on the departments was the number of regulatory changes being passed down to the counties, Milby said. In 18 months, 600 changes were made in food stamp programs alone.

"The people trying to determine eligibility were having a hard time learning all the new rules," Milby said.

Morrow said the counties needed uniform training systems so that everyone could learn the new rules at the same time. "There should be groups of changes at three-month intervals," Milby said.

Morrow said Tuesday, the case workers had so much to do they couldn't give eligibility determination full consideration. "I knew of one person who had a caseload of 500 people and was still trying to determine eligibility," Morrow said. "For one person to keep up with all of that is unacceptable," she said.

Efforts to reduce error rates in AFDC and Medicaid were working, Milby said. Error rates for AFDC dropped to 4.7 percent for the period April 1981, through September 1981, and Medicaid error rates from October 1980, to March 1981, were down to 4.58 percent.

Approval of the map came only after Fountain's supporters struggled for an amendment that in effect would have given the state two congressional redistricting plans.

Rep. George Miller, D-Durham, proposed that the House give federal justice officials 30 days to reconsider redistricting plans enacted by the General Assembly last year. If justice officials had not approved the 1981 plan within that time, the amendment would have put into effect the new reapportionment plan.

The House approved the amendment, but later reversed its decision after stern warnings from Rep. J.P. Huskins, D-Iredell, chairman of the panel that drew up the congressional plans. Huskins predicted that legislators were wasting their time because Justice Department officials would not change their minds about the 1981 plan.

"Here we are today headed down the same road," Huskins said. "They're not going to reconsider the old plan and approve it."
