

Artschool produces 'Getting Out'

By JEFF GROVE
DTH Staff Writer

Gripping theater productions in the Chapel Hill area are not unique to campus organizations. Last Friday, the Artschool's Gallery Theatre opened its production of Getting Out. The play was selected by the American Theatre Critics' Association as the best new play produced at a regional theatre in 1977-78, and this production largely matches the excellence of the play.

Getting Out is about Arie, a vicious young woman in prison after a series of misfortunes. Getting Out is also about Arlene, a timid young woman just released from prison and trying to start over the legitimate way. Yes, they are one and the same person, but two very different characters. The point of the play is to show how Arie becomes Arlene.

As Arlene, Carol Klevay gives an impressive performance. Hers is a difficult role, demanding a good deal of restraint until the last few minutes of the show.

UNC student Shayna Hill dominates the production in the role of Arie, turning in a wrenching portrayal of an abused, disturbed girl.

Arlene falls under the influence of Ruby, a neighbor who is a cook at a nearby diner. Virginia Hayden keeps this role on track most of the time, but there are moments, especially during her entrances, when the character simply doesn't click. Whenever Arlene gets into trouble, Ruby just happens to show up for a visit in time to stave off disaster.

Peter Anlyan plays Bennie, a young ex-prison guard infatuated with Arlene. He is not always a sympathetic character, yet he is one the audience can identify with because he is a very realistic blend of good and bad.

The role of Carl, the pimp who got Arie in jail and now wants to take her back, is played by Peter Hardy. He is the weakest link among the principals, making Carl a stereotype lifted from every bad Burt Reynolds movie ever made. In the real world created by the other characters, he is reduced to a comic book figure.

William Hardy has directed this play with sensitivity and power. He overcomes what could be some tricky traffic problems with ease. And Tony Constant's fragmentary but atmospheric set is also to be commended.

Getting Out continues this weekend, showing at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday, and at 3 p.m. Sunday. Tickets are $4 for Artschool members and $5 for non-members. For reservations, call the Artschool at 929-2896.

UNC sponsors

Jazz Festival

The public is invited to attend the workshops. Friday's begins at 6 p.m. and Saturday's begins at 8:30 a.m. For more information call James Ketch at the Department of Music, 966-4637.

Jazz pianist dies at 61

ENGLEWOOD, N.J. — Thelonious Sphere Monk, a jazz innovator, pianist and composer, died early Wednesday following a stroke suffered on Feb. 5, according to an official at Englewood Hospital. He was 61.

Monk was one of a few jazz players, before World War II, who worked on the harmonic and rhythmic innovations that led to the new jazz style, bebop.

Monk, whose best-known composition was "Round Midnight," began to gain popularity in the 1950s after many years as an unknown.

He was born in Rocky Mount, N.C., Oct. 10, 1920. His father gave all his sons highly unusual names. Monk has a son, Thelonious Sphere Jr., and a daughter who uses the nickname Boo Boo. Both are in the jazz-rock group, T.S. Monk, as drummer-leader and singer respectively.

Monk retired after performing all over Europe in 1972 in a group that included Sonny Stitt and Dizzy Gillespie called the Giants of Jazz. He gave a concert of his own music at Carnegie Hall in 1974 for the New York Jazz Repertory Company and appeared at the Newport Jazz Festival in New York in 1975, with his son on drums.

He is also survived by his wife, Nellie.
