Members of Kappa Epsilon, a service fraternity for pharmacy students, sat behind a table packed with pamphlets handing out sample non-prescription drugs, answering questions and giving advice on how to choose medications.

KE members spent much time in preparation for the Drug Fair.

Lori Tutterow, a fourth-year pharmacy student, said members of the fraternity wrote to drug manufacturers, asking for pamphlets and samples for the fair.

To test their knowledge, members quizzed one another on the make-up and effects of the drugs they would be hand-

"The purpose of the drug fair is to promote public awareness of the most widely used over-the-counter drugs," said Yun Hong, a fourth-year pharmacy student.

"I'm sure some people laugh, but after they laugh, they think about it," said UNC medical student Bev Jones.

Marcher Yonni Chapman, a Chapel Hill resident, said he thought it was "criminal the way the Reagan administration is supporting a fascist regime. "People in this country have many needs that aren't met" because the money is used for things like nuclear weapons, he

Chapman pushed his 16-month-old daughter Sandi in front of him in a stroller, and she added her voice to the chanting. Chapman said it was her fourth demonstration. "She loves it,"

When the march reached Franklin Street, the leader silenced the shouting group for a minute. "Go quiet by the church because they're praying for El Salvador," the protest leader

The marchers reached the Franklin Street post office an hour after they had started. They lined up and turned their individual posters over to form one sign that read, "U.S. Out of El Salvador." Then they lit the candles they had not been able to light while marching because of a strong wind, and held a tenminute silent vigil.

Many of the protesters said they would go to Fort Bragg, in Fayetteville, next week for a state-wide protest of the training of El Salvadoran soldiers there.
