He said that Student Government would support the petition drive, but not the proposed "silent time" at the UNC-Duke game.

Student Government had originally proposed to circulate a flyer at the game which would explain the "silent time" to students.

Protest efforts will include the circulation of a petition among students. "We ... strongly believe that the proposed arrangement of student seats in the new Student Activities Center will be detrimental to student spirit and student athletics," the petition states.

According to the Activities Center's plans, 1,655 students would be placed in the right corner of the lower level, and 6,298 students would be seated in the coliseum's upper level.

Carmichael Auditorium provides 3,600 student seats.

The Residence Hall Association also has endorsed the efforts.

"This protest will be the culmination of efforts to impress upon members of the Education Foundation and the Student Activities Center Steering Committee what will happen if they remove students from outside with their current proposed seating," Leventhal said.

"It is a very tactful way to bring our point across," Morrison said. "This is the last home game, so it's now or never. The (basketball) players have voiced their support — they've said how much it means to them to have students there, cheering for them."

Leventhal said, "We think we're a major factor in Tar Heel games. Carmichael is a formidable place to play with its cheering section."

Students are "overwhelmingly in support of" the effort, he said.

Vandenbergh and Morrison will meet with the Student Activities Center Steering Committee, led by H. Skipper Bowles, on Saturday morning to discuss the seating arrangements.

Project 2000, a study done by the COG, addressed a number of problems that have arisen and that could become big issues in the area.

The project's land-use subcommittee looked into the prospects for area growth.

This committee, of which Green was a member, concluded that growth should be concentrated in and around existing cities as an alternative to sprawl growth.

Green also favors infill growth in towns rather than suggesting that the growth overflow the town limits.

"Infill is one way to achieve compact development," he said.

Carboro residents know only too well about overflow. The town has been populated by University students, employees and others who work in Chapel Hill.

With Chapel Hill's and Carboro's constructive coexistence through common interests like the town bus system, OWASA and the roads system, the two governments exchange ideas and reach mutual agreements.

"You've heard of twin cities," said Roy Williford, Carboro's planning director. "Well, we're like twin towns."

Through the Joint Planning Committee, the two towns can better coordinate individual efforts and can voice concerns with the purpose of finding a workable solution.

Williford said he thought the two governments worked very well together, adding that the planning departments had an open line of communication.

Williford said that in the future there was going to be a need for a better thoroughfare system from outlying areas to the Chapel Hill-Carboro area.

"There needs to be more of a link-up," he said.

As development continues in surrounding towns, this idea may be a recurring one.

While residents who are unable to find housing in Chapel Hill spill over into Carboro, other towns in Orange, Chatham and Alamance counties have had similar experiences.

The Chatham community of Bynum has experienced a growth rate increase, especially to the north of the small township, said Keith Megginson, director of planning for the county.

"Baldwin and Williams (two other Chatham County townships) are the fastest growing townships in the county," Megginson said.

The townships, which border the Haw River, increased in population by 73 percent and 37 percent respectively between 1970 and 1980.

Megginson added that the majority of the residents commute to work in the Triangle area.

Thompson, an Alamance County township located on Orange County's southeastern border, has seen a great deal of growth in the past few years. Because of this, John Jordan, an area realtor, began to convert old mill houses to sell to buyers looking for a home on a large lot in a rural setting.

have to review any financial requests that might come in from such groups, he said.

CGC member Jennifer Cresimore (District 9) also opposed the bill. "I don't believe our fees should fund organizations of religious or political nature," she said. "I don't think we should be pressured into it (funding religious and political organizations), but we were."

Although last night's ruling may not immediately affect the number of organizations applying for CGC funding, groups not originally budgeted may ask for money later in the year. CGC Finance Committee chairperson David Maness said.

"I'd say there will be requests that we wouldn't see otherwise," he said.

Any religious or political organization requesting CGC funding would have to meet the same criteria as other CGC-funded groups, Maness said.

Such organizations must be recognized campus organizations; they must have approved constitutions and bylaws, and must state that they are nondiscriminatory.

In other action, the CGC passed two bills appropriating a total of $3,260 to the Carolina Course Review to let it reinstate its class surveys.

The money will go to buy software for a new computer program that should improve the quality of the review, Maness said.
