

Project's final report predicts area growth

By TAMMY DAVIS
Staff Writer

Jonathan Howes, Director of the UNC Center for Urban and Regional Studies, presented the final report on Project 2000 last week at the monthly meeting of the Triangle J Council of Governments.

Howes, chairman of the state Steering Committee for Project 2000 and former chairman of the Triangle J Council of Governments, said the final report was "just the tip of the iceberg."

Howes said the project began about one year ago. "It originated in the Council Government because we felt the region was on the verge of another great growth spurt," Howes said recently. "In order to plan for that growth, we wanted to organize a group of people that would broaden the participants from just those who are members of the Council Governments."

Howes said the project's purpose was to include a leadership group for planning including representatives of the private sectors and representatives of universities and other institutions in the regions. "It was just a general leadership group to think about planning for the future and what it is going to mean to us."

"We had a steering committee that was composed of about 40 people that included the university presidents of UNC and Duke, leading people from some of the Research Triangle industries and government officials," he said.

The Triangle J region covers six counties—Chatham, Durham, Lee, Orange, Johnston and Wake.

The final report consisted of the reports of the subcommittees on the different parts of growth in the region. It was constructed from a series of reports from all seven subcommittees, Howes said.

"One group dealt with the Built Environment or what we call developmental resources... trying to look at water and other aspects of natural resources," Howes said.

Howes said another topic was human resources.

"We looked at how the people of the region were here and how they were going to live and looked particularly at those who are not in the main stream of economic growth and how they're going to fare in the future," Howes said.

Howes said the group paid particular attention to migrant and seasonal farmers. They are still important because they make a significant economic contribution and yet their participation in society is low, he said.

"We also looked at public service needs—everything from the demands of schools and water to the police service and fire protection," Howes said.

The report also focused on three basic resources—water, energy and land. "It's pretty much across the board," Howes said.

"We try to suggest some of the conflicts and trade-offs that are going to be involved in attaining the kind of future that we think is desirable," he said.

"It was very much a kind of seat-of-the-pants effort," Howes said. "There have been goal and future planning exercises in places all over the country and they've hired big staffs and had futurists come in from all over the place."

However, Howes said the Triangle J project was not like that. "Ours is very much an indigenous effort. We did it with our own local people. We just ended up with 150 people just sitting around the thinking and talking about the future," he said.

Jonathan Howes

Howes said the Triangle J Council of Governments does not project a future with all new technologies although those kinds of things may happen. "What we really do is project incrementally what's going to happen if growth as we now observe it continues," he said.

"I think it's a solid and appropriate way to plan because it is citizen-based and it's the kind of thing that people can understand," Howes said.

productivity and wages and absenteeism caused by smoking-related illnesses.

Anne Browder, assistant to the president of the Tobacco Institute, said tobacco products were already overtaxed. "If the tax on automobiles was as high as the tax on cigarettes, a $6,000 car would cost $10,000," she said.

The Athletics Cabinet has been eliminated from the cabinet because there are not enough student responsibilities in athletics to justify the position, Vandenberg said.

But the recent outstanding exception has been the controversy over the tentative student seating for the proposed Student Activities Center. An executive assistant will collaborate with the Carolina Athletic Association on the Survey probes concerns of state

By LAURA SEIFERT

North Carolina citizens will have the chance to participate in a state-wide survey during the next few months that is designed to evaluate issues of concern to the state.

The distribution of the surveys is part of Project 2000, a commission appointed by Gov. Jim Hunt to assess concerns that have the potential to become state problems by the year 2000.

Orange County, like the 99 other counties in the state, has formed a volunteer committee to bring the project to the citizens.

"The committees were formed in order to get local input... and to stimulate interest (for the project)," said Terry Lathrop, chairman of the Orange County Steering Committee for Project 2000.

"The first thing is to distribute state-wide a 'ballot' of issues (to all the counties)," Lathrop said.

"The ballots will be published in newspapers, and (state officials plan) to have elementary school students get them and take them home to their parents."

The surveys will then be collected and the county committee will prepare a set of recommended actions. That draft will be circulated throughout the state. Citizen input comes in at this stage, also.

"Then, in September, each county will send representatives to a state-wide meeting, where the recommendations will once again be reviewed," Lathrop said.

The county volunteer committee is responsible for getting the information to the citizens, then reporting its feelings to the state level.

"We are there to help with publicizing the ballot and promoting its return," he said.

The county committee met in February, Lathrop said, and is not scheduled to meet again until it is ready to review the citizens' recommendations.

"I think it's the best survey of its type I've ever seen," he said.

After the committee finalizes its recommendations, it will present them to the governor and to the legislature.

Gov. Jim Hunt

Asked if the governor would take action and do something about the findings, Lathrop said, "One hopes."

Rep. Walter Jones, D-N.C., also said he did not expect the president to take any action against the tobacco industry. "In my opinion,

I think the president will stand firm in his decision and will not increase the excise tax on tobacco," he said.

federal taxes and contributed $58 billion to the gross national product. "This is a sizeable contribution to the economy," she said.

Browder said tobacco farmers were not feeling any threat to the industry. "Reagan refused to increase the tax, so I don't think there will be any problem," she said.

activities of several related cabinet offices.

Vandenberg has added a sixth executive assistant, who will be concerned with promoting student awareness and participation in Student Government.

However, past presidents have said the cabinet restructuring should not be considered as being radical.

"The essential structure of Student Government is there, and will stay," Norberg said. "Each new president will make modifications on this structure from year to year."

The existing structure for Student Government was developed primarily by former Student Body President Jim Phillips, Bob Saunders, 1980-1981 student body president, said.

Phillips created five student committees that would work within Student Government, Saunders said. The next president, J.B. Kelly, formed 12 committees, and Saunders and Norberg have added and dropped a few committees from that total.

"There is a tremendous temptation to differentiate yourself from your predecessors, which is natural," Saunders said. "But how much change is necessary and how much isn't is a judgment call."

"These changes are necessary every year," he said. "The format of Student Government needs to change with the times."
