gressional Club and the military-industrial complex."
UNC student Eileen Church said she was protesting Cobey's fund-raising dinner because his views were the same as Helms' and East's.
"They're all against minorities and women," she said. "They just don't speak for me."

As Bush and Helms stepped out of their limousine at the Sheraton Crabtree for the dinner, one woman yelled, "God bless you Jesse." Carmel DeMirand of Raleigh, standing outside the hotel with her three children, said she disapproved of the nearby protest.
"I'm tired of them protesting and tearing down our country," she said.

Amtrak hostages still held

The Associated Press

RALEIGH — An "erratic" man holding two children hostage in an Amtrak sleeper car gave up one pistol Sunday in a gesture of "faith" after saying he would surrender if his godfather spoke to him, police said.

But late Sunday he told police the 9-month-old baby in the compartment was dead, said Sgt. R.K. Carroll, adding that police were not convinced.

"He's told us things before that didn't turn out to be true," he said.

The gunman, who accepted food for the first time in the three-day standoff, also told police that a woman hostage was dead and that he had shot another man.

Sunday night he lowered a bundle containing a 9-mm pistol out the window of the car, said Police Chief Fred Heineman.

"This is a show of faith," Price said, adding that the pistols were exchanged for cigarettes, matches and colas.

Meanwhile, police continued the search for a Manhattan, N.Y., man the gunman identified as his godfather, Price said. Police believe the man is also the gunman's uncle, he added.

Earlier, the thin, bare-chested, bare-legged gunman yelled, waved his arm in a circular motion through a window police had broken open, closed the window shade and left a white sheet hanging out the window.

The gunman was heard to say, "Don't shoot, don't shoot, I want water" in Spanish.

He pulled up a blue bag on the end of a rope police had provided. Police Capt. B.E. Tucker said the bag contained sandwiches, donuts, Gatorade and intravenous solution that could be taken by mouth.

The gunman then told police that he would surrender if his godfather came to Raleigh to talk to him, said Raleigh Police Chief Frederick Heineman, who said the man was a lawyer.

The gunman also told police that he had shot a man he called W. Rodriguez. "A W. Rodriguez was initially thought to be the individual" holding the hostages, said Raleigh police Capt. C.L. Price. "He says now that his name is Mario Rodriguez and that he shot W. Rodriguez."

Price said the gunman told them that the man's first name was William. He said police did not know if there was another body on the train.

"He said that he shot him," Price said. "We don't know if that was in Florida, before the trip, during the trip or what He told us that yesterday when he was very irrational. He told us that again today when he is rational."

Heineman said he was more confident that the crisis, which began at 7:20 a.m. Friday, could be resolved because the man "knows we are not going to shoot him."

Throughout the standoff, police carrying rifles took positions around the station area. On Sunday evening, a truck bearing snipers pulled up near the train.

Police said they had not shot at the man since the standoff began because they did not want to endanger the children. Police said they believed the children were both girls, aged 9 months and 4 years.

The standoff began when Raleigh police received a call about a shooting on the Amtrak Silver Star. Passengers on the train told police they heard arguments and shots shortly before the train pulled into the Raleigh station, a colonial-style brick building built in the 1930s.

Police ordered the gunman to come out, but the gunman refused. During the first 29 hours of the standoff, the man only spoke once to tell police everything was all right. At noon Saturday, he began talking again, telling police he planned to kill himself, and that he would kill the children if police tried to storm the compartment.
