GPSF still to decide where to use funds

By MARK STINNEFORD
Staff Writer

The Student Activities Fund Office released figures Tuesday affirming that the Graduate and Professional Student Federation has been shorted $10,136 in student activity fees over the past two academic years, but the GPSF Senate Tuesday night delayed a decision on allocating the money.

An administrative error by the office of business and finance caused SAFO to incorrectly calculate the total activity fees paid by graduate and professional students, ultimately resulting in the miscalculation of fees to the GPSF, Wayne Jones, acting vice chancellor of business and finance, said last month.

As the result of a campus-wide referendum held in February 1980, the GPSF is entitled to 15 percent of the activity fees paid by graduate and professional students.

The GPSF Senate heard a variety of proposals Tuesday, but put off a final decision for allocating the money until Nov. 30.

"We need to develop more specific alternatives for use of the funds," GPSF President Peter Mallinson said. "Today's meeting served to get some general ideas which we'll turn into concrete proposals. Many of the representatives were not even aware of this windfall until today."

The GPSF Finance Committee recommended that part of the money be used to set up a five-year, $5,000 scholarship fund to support graduate research projects. Under the committee's proposals, one $500 award would be made from the fund each semester.

"Our feeling is that there is enough money currently available for tuition assistance and things like that," said Mae Liao, GPSF Finance Committee Chairperson. "But there have been severe cuts in research grants. Because research is costly by nature, those cuts are extremely hard to replace."

The Finance Committee also recommended that some of the back fees be used to make a small contribution to the Student Alliance for Voters' Education, a political action committee that has organized protest against proposed federal cuts in student financial aid.

The Finance Committee also recommended a $500 surplus fund be created, to be continued from semester to semester, to support general events for graduate and professional students.

Because of the correction in funding, the GPSF will see an increased annual budget. Prior to the discovery of the funding error, the GPSF Senate allocated the $14,000 in student activity fees it expected to receive during the 1982-83 school year. It provided $9,910 to graduate and professional departments and schools for social functions and approved a $4,090 GPSF office budget.

The GPSF will now receive about $19,000 in student activity fees during 1982-83 — excluding the back fees it is to receive. The GPSF Senate voted to allocate the additional $5,000 to schools and departments.

At universities, students are removed from their families and can tend to feel shut off, not at home, Woodrum said. While family members might inquire if they thought a woman was involved in a violent relationship, strangers (people at universities) are likely to stay out of the situation, Woodrum said. These factors make it more difficult for a woman to report violence or to try to get out of a violent relationship, he added.

And some women believe that if a boyfriend hits them, especially out of jealousy, he is showing them that he loves them or he cares, Woodrum said. These women accept violence as a part of the relationship.

"You know it happens to people, but not people like you. There might be a tendency to judge yourself and deny the problem."

According to a survey conducted by Karen M. Gentemann, a research associate at the UNC Institute for Research in Social Science, educated women justify beating less often than those with little education. In the IRSS survey (a telephone survey of 422 women), only 7.3 percent of those women with some college justified beating while 38.6 percent of those women with an eighth-grade education or less justified violence.

The IRSS study suggests that women with more education would be less likely to stay in an abusive relationship. Woodrum said that this was not always true. "Anybody can be abused."

Trudy Mills, an instructor in sociology at UNC-Greensboro and a former graduate student at UNC, interviewed women who were in abusive relationships as part of her doctoral work. Mills said she found employment and activities outside the home to play a bigger role than education in a woman's acceptance of beating.

"It wasn't so much the education per se as whether they had a job that was important to them," she said.

Although Mills talked with older women, she said the problems would probably be similar with college students.

"You keep hoping that this is going to be the last time it ever happens."

Jane was able to get out of her relationship with the man who was beating her, but it wasn't easy.

There are several options on campus for women in violent relationships, according to Anne Bowden, assistant dean of the department of student life. Women who live in residence halls can talk to an area director for help. The department of student life can help in some cases, she said, and the Mental Health Center (in Student Health Services) or the University Counseling Center in Nash Hall are also options, Bowden said. More serious cases (more violent ones), are usually referred to the mental health center, she said.

Although the four options help women in different ways, all of them place a "clear emphasis on helping the woman who is asking for help," Bowden added.

And the help is needed.

monetary policy but rather of lender fears that inflation will worsen because of huge expected federal budget deficits.

The bills seek to reduce the record spread between the inflation rate and interest rates. Historically, the spread has been 1 to 4 percentage points, but in the last two years, the spread has been running between 6 and 10 points.

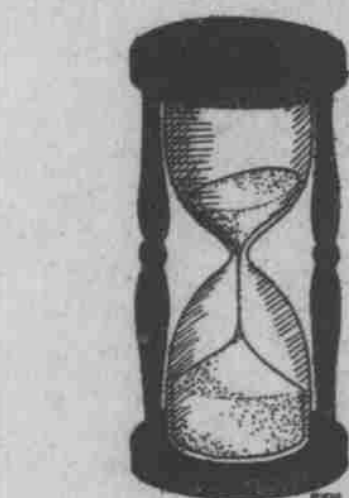

For example, the prime lending rate of most banks is 12 percent, but the inflation rate as measured by the Consumer Price Index is only 5 percent.

Kinoy told the law students that the essence of what they were studying was the existence and protection of a written constitution protecting the elemental rights of the people.

He added that former Supreme Court Chief Justice John Marshall once said the essence of the structure of U.S. government depended on the Constitution's limiting the powers of the government and eliminating the danger of a tyranny and an autocracy.

Kinoy told the law students that they should take an active role in the case.
