March protests UNC hiring practices

Students concerned with UNC's efforts to hire minority and women faculty marched to South Building to voice their complaints Friday. Protesters have been marching almost daily for the last several weeks.

This time the focus was on the University's academic department heads, who are responsible for hiring within the departments. The approximately 40 students participating in the protest chanted, "Department heads are slack. We need more women and blacks," as they marched toward the offices of the University's administration.

"Are the department heads doing their jobs?" asked Chuck Hennessee, one of the leaders of the informal group.

Friday's rally was sponsored by the Association for Women Students, the Public Interest Research Group and the informal group that has been protesting black faculty hiring. These groups also are scheduled to present a rally against discrimination today at noon in the Pit.

"The business school has no women faculty," Hennessee said on the steps of South Building. "Are you willing to accept that no women are qualified to work there?"

"We're not saying to hire faculty just because they're women and blacks," he said. "We're saying that there should be more of an effort to hire them."

Hennessee said one step for the students to take was to select a department and ask the chairman what was being done to hire blacks and women.

Adnetria Parker, Miss Black Student Movement, followed Hennessee with a short speech. "We're here for others," she said. "Think about the students who are going to be here after you're gone. Write letters to the departments and put pressure on them."

referendum

Last year, the religious political issue was a stumbling block in the CGC budgeting process. Budget requests from the Black Student Movement Gospel Choir were questioned because of the possible religious connotations connected with the term "gospel."

"If the Supreme Court can make an unbiased ruling, then the bill will have served its purpose," Vandenberg said. "However, if they continuously intervene in the process, then the bill will have been a mistake."

The initiative referendum was designed to lessen the student body president's discretionary powers to determine the constitutionality of a referendum, Vandenberg said.

"The bill simply says that the president, if he determines the bill to be constitutional, must—as opposed to shall—pass the petition to the Elections Board Chairman," he said.

Vandenberg said he saw no difference in the two words and was concerned that the referendum missed the point.

"A more important question is what constitutes a constitutional initiative by the student body," Vandenberg said. "However, I don't think the bill is harmful in any way and I don't think it will affect the operation of Student Government."

The divestment referendum will give students the opportunity to express an opinion on the University's investment in firms with interests in South Africa.

The referendum was placed on the ballot by members of the UNC Public Interest Research Group, who have called for the University to divest of firms operating in South Africa during the past few months.

The referendum will ask whether the UNC Board of Trustees' Endowment Fund should divest itself of holdings in firms operating in South Africa, as well as asking the board to start a task force to investigate the criteria the University uses to invest funds.

However, the vote will carry no legal weight and will instead serve as a recommendation to University officials.

Members of PIRG collected 2,692 signatures on their referendum petition and then handed the petitions to Vandenberg. The Student Constitution allows that any organization collecting signatures from 10 percent of the student body can direct the student body president to call a referendum.

CGC

which she felt would best represent organizations like AWS, ECOS, and the UNC Public Interest Research Group, she said.

The main complaint of these groups was the CGC's rejection of funds for controversial programs, Swaringer said.

"They were saying that groups (such as PIRG, AWS, ECOS) should not address controversial issues," she said. "Getting involved in controversial issues should be a vital part of being a student at Carolina."

AWS Chairperson Mary Linker said this year's CGC has been reactionary toward social change.

"They're just afraid of social change except for change toward more conservatism," she said.

Last spring, the CGC cut both AWS' and ECOS' budget categories for speakers, based on qualitative committee reports that said proposed speakers for those groups were "political" activists. The Student Government Treasury Laws restrict funding for "political" and "religious" programs, although the words are not defined.

Painter said the conservatives on the CGC were not opposed to addressing controversial issues, but he said they objected to a one-sided approach.

"A forum with opposing speakers and student debate is educational, but calling a one-sided presentation of an issue educational is a farce," he said.

Painter also said that using mandatory student fees to promote one side of a controversial issue was "totally ridiculous." "I don't think that any student should have to pay for pro-abortion programs when he's against abortion," he said.

Black Student Movement Chairperson Wende Watson said that while the BSM was not promoting certain candidates for CGC, the organization was concerned with the way the council had funded programs.

"Political was a word that was undefined," she said. "And (the council) used it to not fund the programs of some organizations like AWS and the BSM.... I think we could help the CGC clarify that."

Watson said that with "fewer narrow-minded people running, the council can be more concerned with the rights and needs of student organizations."

"We're not asking that people necessarily be pro-BSM; we just don't want them to be anti-BSM," she said. "We were very disappointed in the way we were treated last year during the budget hearings."

Although the new council would be "a little more toward the left," passage of a referendum addressing the "political" and "religious" funding restrictions would help to temper debate, Painter said.

If the referendum passes in Tuesday's campus election, student organizations denied funding for programs termed "political" or "religious" would be able to appeal those decisions to the Student Supreme Court. Painter said the referendum would be useful for both organizations denied funding and those who oppose funded programs of other groups which they consider political or religious.

"This year the conservatives opened the CGC to a wider spectrum of debate and forced the council to consider both sides of the issue," he said. "We set the tone of debate. The referendum could keep some of that objectiveness in the council."
