

Will the real Carolina quarterback please stand up?

Stay tuned. This show may be on the air for a while.
On cue: Will the real North Carolina quarterback please stand up?
Saturday's grand premier in Kenan Stadium left most with the impression that North Carolina can't afford many re-runs. Re-makes, maybe. Re-runs, no.

Michael DeSisti

Kevin Anthony and Mark Maye each had his moments during a 33-30 loss to Navy, and each made mistakes. But neither sufficiently answered the question collecting dust in the minds of so many around this town.
Four days before the Navy game the initial plan for replacing 1983 graduate Scott Stankavage, now with the Denver Broncos, was announced.
"We told Mark and Kevin we were going to go with Kevin early and then let Mark come in," said Randy Walker, the UNC quarterback coach. "After that we didn't have anything in writing or make anything concrete. We just decided to play it by ear."

The song remains the same for this Saturday's game against Boston College in Foxboro, Mass. Anthony is scheduled to start, Maye to come in early. After that it's anybody's guess.
But mostly Dick Crum's.

"It's extremely important at this point that they both get experience," said the UNC head coach. "As for the other 10 guys on the field, they're comfortable with either quarterback."

What makes this situation unique among depth-chart duals is that it may present itself for the next three seasons.

Anthony, a 1982 redshirt and Stankavage's backup last year, will have two more years of eligibility after this season. Maye, redshirted in 1983 after being recruited at Charlotte Independence by most every major college in the nation, will have three.

"At this point, I'm looking at it week by week," said Anthony, a native of Decatur, Ga. "But it could change within a game. That's something I understand and Mark understands. You just have to get used to it."

What makes this situation sticky is that it's a case where having too much talent is as much a dilemma as it is a dream.

Kevin Anthony: A 6-2, 188-pound sophomore. The more mobile quarterback; throws short- to medium-range well on the roll out. Can run the option. A heady player.

Mark Maye: A 6-4, 200-pound freshman. A classic dropback passer with a classic arm. Can run through people. They cast the mold with this kid.

In a direct sense, North Carolina won't suffer with either Anthony or Maye at quarterback. Both can play, and their teammates will be the first to tell you.

But the quarterbacks themselves might be affected by a continual shuffle, especially when the substitutions are unpredictable and irregular. It's tough coming into a game off the bench; coming in two, three or four times is that much more difficult.

"You just have to try and keep your head in the game more and wait for a chance to get in there," Maye said.

Some logic: Too much substitution between the two is bad for Anthony and Maye. What's bad for the quarterbacks is bad for the team. Therefore, too much substitution at quarterback is bad for the team.

Hold the applause, please.

So playing it by ear might not be the best method. But the alternatives are few.

•Predetermined playing time: Anthony plays the first quarter, Maye the second. Some sort of substitution schedule of regular intervals. This will eliminate the surprise element.

But at the same time, there's the risk of cooling off a hot hand (e.g. Anthony vs. Navy: 7-of-7 for 116 yards early in the second quarter; Crum sits him down for Maye to give the freshman his first game experience).

•A one-man show: Fiddle for another week or two, then make a decision to play one or the other until his performance necessitates a change.

The obvious drawback here is that chances are, with Anthony and Maye, whoever's in the game is going to stay there, which would leave an awful lot of talent on the bench.

There is, however, another option.

•The Non-plan: Make junior Wes Sweetser, the No. 3 man on the depth chart, the quarterback. Start him for two years, and in the meantime come up with something for these other prodigies. That leaves just one year to pull hair, after which Anthony will graduate.

And you thought Lombardi was ingenious.

usage. She said the fields were in continual use from 3-10 p.m. daily, with two teams per field. "(And) Rams Club members park on the fields, leaving glass, paper, chicken bones and tire marks."

The SCC is looking for an alternative field, and has an eye on the Finley Golf Course fields, but nothing has been finalized.

"The SCC is trying to get its own field and we're behind them on that," Frye said.

In the meantime, the clubs will continue to go without any storage space until arrangements can be worked out. Carmichael Auditorium has been mentioned as a possibility once the Student Activities Centers opens, but Hutson said the SCC has been told not to count on Carmichael space.

UNC Athletic Director John Swoford discussed that possibility with 1982-83 Carolina Athletic Association President Padraic Baxter, but no agreement was reached.
