Political

Students with an inclination toward politics either as a vocation or avocation will find the University fertile ground for political activity.

Whether the student wants to be a part of a national political campaign or just the campus governing council doesn't matter; from the Young Democrats to the College Republicans to Student Government, students have a number of opportunities to make important decisions on campus.

Honorary and Service

Members of the Society of Janus rally around the Ginkgo

Honorary, scholastic and service organizations do things ranging from recognizing academic excellence to protecting Ginkgo trees.

This range is reflected by the large number of organizations existing here, each with its own purpose and looking for genuinely interested students.

By joining service organizations students help themselves and help others at the same time. Honorary organizations do much to help others, but most have qualifications that must be met before a student can join. In many cases these serve as incentives for students to work harder.

Many times students join these organizations to foster their own education. But in most cases students have a desire to try and change things for the better."
