Interfaith soup kitchen forced to relocate by lodge members

By KATHERINE WOOD
Staff Writer

Although the Soup Kitchen operated by the Chapel Hill Interfaith Center for Social Services was forced to move last December, the kitchen has continued to feed about 35 needy people every day, Richard Laudati, the center's general services chairman, said.

The soup kitchen was forced to move from its location in the Masonic Lodge at 705 W. Rosemary St. because the lodge members had complained about the soup kitchen's patrons loitering around the building after the kitchen's regular hours.

The lodge members, who had been allowing the center to use the space rent-free, also felt they could no longer continue lending the building to the group because of space problems, Clifton Stone, lodge president at the time, said when he announced the kitchen's move.

According to Laudati the Soup Kitchen moved from its rent-free home in the masonic lodge because there was "no longer compatibility between the two organizations." None of the masonic lodge members would comment at this time on the reasons for the move.

Laudati saidthat the ICSS has relocated its Soup Kitchen at 111 Merrit Mill Road. Renovations on the building have changed what used to be a hairdresser's establishment into a full-fledged kitchen with an industrial sink Laudati said. Although the construction was completed and the Soup Kitchen officially opened only last month, congregations of ICSS volunteers have continued the feeding out of the backs of cars on the kitchen's lot said Laudati. Even a major move in the middle of winter did not stop the ICSS from providing aid to those who were dependent on their services.

Grace Hicks, an ICSS volunteer and Monitor Coordinator of the Soup Kitchen, said that attendance to the kitchen has been increasing since the move. She also said that many of the former patrons who are poor, homeless, or deinstitutionalized continue to come to the kitchen along with the new ones.

Hicks said that the new kitchen is more attractive than the old one because ICSS volunteers designed and decorated it themselves. She said that the volunteers hope to create a feeling of unity among its patrons as well as provide them with nutritious meals.

Although the ICSS must now pay $400 rent per month on the new Soup Kitchen, Hicks said that the volunteers would still be able to serve their patrons in the same capacity as before. Funding for the Soup Kitchen is currently made available through individual and group donations to the ICSS.
