UNC and Belmont Abbey players fight for the ball in Tar Heel's 4-0 whitewash Wednesday afternoon

Soccer's win is ugly

By JAMES SUROWIECKI

Okay, so it wasn't the prettiest game you ever saw. So it looked as if the UNC men's soccer team had decided to borrow a page from the 1983 Chicago White Sox and "win ugly". So what?

The Tar Heels' 4-0 victory over Belmont Abbey Wednesday was still a shutout, the third in a row for the suddenly revitalized UNC squad. Buoyed by a tenacious defense and an offense that is playing just well enough to win, the Tar Heels never really let the Crusaders into the game en route to their 10th victory of the year against seven defeats.

Not long after UNC goalkeeper Darren Royer made one of his two saves of the afternoon, Donald Cogsville stole the ball and broke in on the right side. Utilizing his tremendous speed, Cogsville burst past his defender and let a 22-yard howitzer go that beat the Belmont goalie to the left side.

That goal proved to be the game-winner, thanks to an offside call which disallowed a Belmont goal with ten minutes to go in the first half. In one of the few defensive breakdowns suffered by UNC during the game, the Crusaders broke in two-on-one on Royer, and Russell Patmore tipped in a pass that appeared to tie the game at one. Patmore, however, was offside on the play, and UNC's shutout skein was rescued from the gallows to which Patmore's goal had consigned it.

The Tar Heels made the most of the reprieve, as they began to press offensively and six minutes later upped their lead to two thanks to captain Marcus Martin. Martin's goal was no work of art, but it worked, as he got the ball at the edge of the box off of a deflection by a Crusader defender, pivoted and ripped a shot off the left post into the net to give UNC a 2-0 halftime lead.

The Tar Heels came firing out of the lockerroom to begin the second half, and indeed about the only thing Belmont Abbey did in the second period was clear the ball out of its own end. At 61:56, Dino Megaloudis blocked a clearing pass and started a 4-on-3 break. He then sent a pass to Dave Smyth, who battled for the ball and fired a shot that froze the Crusader goaltender and bulged the net cords to make the score 3-0.

Fifteen minutes later, Tommy Nicholson sealed the victory with a 20-yard blast off a pass from Smyth to end the scoring.

It was an interesting game for the Tar Heels, who hadn't scored as many as four goals since their victory over Atlantic Christian in September. The real story of the game was the defense, though, which has not allowed a goal in 332 minutes. That streak has been due more to excellent play by the defensemen than to any scintillating performances by Royer.

"We're very pleased with the way we're playing in the back," coach Anson Dorrance said.

Old flames spark panic

Dear Steven: My life is ruined! I had just gotten out of the car to return a couple of books at the library when I saw her: The woman from my past who was responsible for almost three years of nightmares. Well, at least I thought it was her.

My heart was pounding. I flew back into the car, cranked it up and left 100 feet of rubber as I got out of Dodge.

I dated Cheryl when I lived in New York, and our relationship ended up on a very sour note. We made a clean break of it and I even left town to get away from her. The woman I spotted at the library sure did look like her, but why would she have moved here? If it is, this time I can't pack up and split. I'm married with my second kid on the way. I'm so nervous I don't know what to do. When my wife asked why I looked as white as a sheet when I returned home, I told her I ran over a cat. Boy, am I in trouble. What should I do?

— Nervous In Raleigh, N.C.
Dear Nervous: About a year ago a similar thing happened to me while I was doing a load of laundry. I turned around and spotted a lady who looked too much like an old flame of mine from Miami. Well, I didn't hang around the Laundromat long enough for my stuff to dry, and got into the car trying to figure out how I'd break the news about our new neighbor to my wife. I saw her again a few days later and was relieved to discover that all my sweat was for nothing. In fact, I even introduced myself and told my new friend, Lisa, what she had done to me. Before locking yourself up in the closet, why don't you do a little checking around even though the odds are a million to one that your ex has invaded your territory. A call to a friend or two in New York may give you an answer. Ask telephone information for her listing. Even drop her name at the library. Even if it is her there's no need for a major freak-out. Most of us can grow a lot in three years. Maybe you can both handle a casual hello the next time around. Let us know how it turns out.

Dear Steven: This is going to sound crazy, but my girlfriend has this nutty idea about sex in public places. She wants to make it among the stacks of the graduate library at school. I must admit, the thought of it does create a tinge of excitement, but I'm sure this is the kind of thing that can get us thrown out of school if caught. Should we go for it?

— Adventurous in N.C.

Dear Twosome: I have the feeling that whatever I say isn't going to make any difference. But remember, you now have a couple of hundred thousand N.C. students wondering where the show is going to be. We expect a full report.
