Campus Y reinstates George Gamble

By GRANT PARSONS

George R. Gamble has been reinstated as associate director of the Campus Y, Zenobia Hatcher-Wilson, director of the Campus Y, said in a press release Monday.

Gamble and Hatcher-Wilson have agreed not to discuss publicly the conditions concerning his reinstatement, according to the press release.

The decision came after negotiations that lasted until 3 a.m. Monday between Gamble, Hatcher-Wilson, Edith Wiggins, associate vice chancellor for student affairs, and Maria Young and George Lensing of the Campus Y advisory board.

Hatcher-Wilson dismissed Gamble seven weeks ago, and his last day had been scheduled for Jan. 6. His reinstatement follows weeks of protests and vigils by Campus Y members who wanted him reinstated, claiming that students' interests were not considered in the firing decision.

Hatcher-Wilson said in the press release: "On Sunday night, November 24, 1985, I called a meeting of George Gamble, George Lensing, Maria Young and Edith Wiggins that continued Monday morning.

"The purpose of those meetings was to indicate my willingness to be responsive to the sentiments of the students, Advisory Board of the Campus Y, and many others in the University Community. As a result of those meetings, I have reconsidered the personnel decision based on the conditions mutually agreed upon.

"Mr. Gamble will remain in his position beyond January 6, 1986," the press release said. "An important condition of the change is our agreement not to discuss publicly the terms under which I am allowing Mr. Gamble to remain." The release is signed by Hatcher-Wilson.

Gamble, speaking Monday to a group of Campus Y members, said he was happy with Hatcher-Wilson's decision to reinstate him.

"I hope that with my reinstatement the University has seen a change toward students' interests that you students have created," Gamble said.

Because of his agreement with Hatcher-Wilson, Gamble said he could not talk about the conditions of his reinstatement.

"What I can do is assure you to the best of my abilities that I am willing to live by and am comfortable with the conditions set forth in the press release," Gamble said.

Gamble said he had hoped the conditions of his reinstatement would not have to be kept secret. "Secret things are kind of anathema to this University's beliefs," Gamble said. "We were unable to reach an agreement that the reasons could be made public."

Hatcher-Wilson said Monday she decided to reinstate Gamble because after listening to the students, she felt there was a need to be responsive.

"I did it because this is the Y — being responsible to the Y," she said. "It is in that spirit that I decided to reconsider my decision."

Hatcher-Wilson said she hoped that the Y could now move on to more productive issues, and said she would not elaborate beyond what was written in the press release about why the conditions of Gamble's reinstatement should be kept secret.

"It's just not necessary," she said. "It was mutual for George Gamble and I and is therefore not necessary to discuss it."

"We have both pledged to work for the Y," Hatcher-Wilson said.

Roger Orstad, Campus Y co-president, said Monday that he was glad to get Gamble reinstated. "This has been the goal of our whole efforts so far," he said. "We feel good now."

"(But) there is a little problem with keeping the conditions of Gamble's firing secret," Orstad said. "George expressed that he was happy with it — that's what's important."

Orstad said it was important to thank Hatcher-Wilson for reinstating Gamble. "That further states that the Y believes what it stands for," he said. "It's going to re-establish students' faith in what the students stand for."

Gamble was reinstated, Orstad said, because the parties involved thought it was in the best interests of the Campus Y.

"Student pressure had a great deal of impact on the administration," he said. "We've put a lot of heat on the administration to come to a solution to this problem."

There are still many questions concerning student affairs, Orstad said, "for example, how student affairs answers the needs of the students. 'Just because the Campus Y issue is resolved does not mean the larger issues go away.'"

Orstad said he was most concerned with getting the Campus Y back on its feet after the weeks of protests and vigils.

Apartheid discussed by group

Kenneth Fassie and his younger brother attended a rally in South Africa nine years ago protesting the living conditions of his family and his people. He was tear-gassed and his brother killed.

"My younger brother was running beside me (after they threw tear gas at us). I looked back and saw my brother was not beside me. . . . I thought he had a broken ankle. As I went back to pull him up, I did not realize he was dead. The second time, I saw his face . . . he had been shot and blood was upon his shirt," Fassie said.

Fassie, a student from Cape Town, South Africa who attends N.C. Central University, said the death of his brother prompted him to become a political activist and organizer of protests against the South African practice of apartheid.

Fassie spoke in the Student Union Monday night at a discussion sponsored by the UNC Anti-Apartheid Support Group.

Fassie criticized the American involvement in South Africa as being harmful to blacks.

"Most people do not understand we are not only oppressed by the South African government," he said. "The western world is (also) oppressive."

"Ford Motor Company offered South Africa shock batons and trucks to maintain stability," he said. "You can see how the involvement of these companies is not just economic, but military involvement."

He said support groups in the United States for the anti-apartheid movement were creating a separation between the government and the black people, which is what South African blacks

Students push for more involvement in Student Affairs

A group of about 30 students marched through Steele Building Monday to protest a lack of consideration of student input by University administrators when making decisions that affect student life.

Chanting, "We want the student in student affairs," the marchers came from a rally in the Pit to voice discontent with the Division of Student Affairs. They stayed in the central hallway and chanted for about two minutes before returning outside.

Later, another group presented letters signed by students calling for action by Donald Boulton, vice chancellor and dean of student affairs, to end the "blatant disregard of students' rights and feelings in the operation in the office of student affairs."

The rally, sponsored by Students for a Student Voice, drew about 150 spectators as some students spoke and about 25 others stood in the Pit holding signs saying "Students in Steele chains," "Education, not dictation" and "It's 1985. Do you know where your rights are?"

"We've been stepped on," Karl Tameler, a spokesman for Students for a Student Voice, told the crowd. "They're not using student affairs in the interests of the students. They're using it in an effort to maintain the status quo."

Tameler said the latest incident in a string of events that showed disregard for the students was the dismissal of George R. Gamble, associate director of the Campus Y.

Gamble was reinstated Monday after being dismissed over a month ago by Campus Y Director Zenobia Hatcher-Wilson.

Campus Y Co-president Kim Reynolds said Boulton had not fully considered her input concerning Gamble's dismissal.

"You always hear the same story," Reynolds said. "They tell us they value our input and that they appreciate our concern. They tell us that they'll consider our views and shuffle us out the door."

"They also add 'We know what's best for the Y,'" she said to loud cheers from the crowd. "Then, as we walk out the door, they say, 'By the way, all this publicity is not a good thing.'"

Robert J. Cox, an associate professor in the Speech department, said the faculty supported students in their efforts to get Gamble reinstated.

"The faculty members I've talked to are astounded at how this affair has been handled," Cox said. "In the past, the faculty may have had questions about how things have been handled, but we have kept our peace — but no more."

Cox said there were a number of questions that needed to be answered by the Division of Student Affairs. "Number one: Why was an effective and popular professor fired?" he said. "Two: Why was there no student input into the decision to fire him?"

Other questions, Cox said, that needed answers were why students were not given an explanation for Gamble's firing and why Boulton had not acted in the student's interests to reinstate Gamble.

"Also, what precedent does this establish about student affairs' control over student organizations," he said.

Sibby Anderson, president of the Black Student Movement, said she had a similar experience when talking with

Students still discontented after talk with dean

Students remained dissatisfied with the Division of Student Affairs after a two-hour meeting Monday with Donald A. Boulton, vice chancellor and dean of student affairs.

Boulton met with about 50 students in the Campus Y Lounge to discuss the future of the Campus Y and students' relations with the Division of Student Affairs. The meeting followed the reinstatement of Campus Y Associate Director George R. Gamble, who had been dismissed by Campus Y Director Zenobia Hatcher-Wilson over a month ago. Gamble's last day had been scheduled for Jan. 6.

Hatcher-Wilson reinstated Gamble on Monday, following weeks of student vigils and protests about the lack of student input into his dismissal. Boulton met with students at the request of Joel Katzenstein, organizer of Students for a Student Voice, the new group formed to voice student concerns about their relationship with the Division of Student Affairs.

Students told Boulton at the meeting that although they were happy with Gamble's reinstatement, they were dissatisfied with the secrecy surrounding it. Hatcher-Wilson had said earlier in the day that she and Gamble had agreed to keep the conditions of his reinstatement confidential.

David Brown, former Campus Y co-president, said keeping the terms of the reinstatement secret was perpetuating students' distrust of the Division of Student Affairs.

"I don't think it would be unfair for some students to think that this reinstatement is merely pushing back the date (of Gamble's dismissal) to May 6 (instead of January 6)," Brown said.

Boulton said he was pleased with Hatcher-Wilson's decision to reinstate Gamble, but said he could not discuss the terms of the agreement. "I intend to honor their pledge (of confidentiality) very deeply," Boulton said.

He also declined to say whether he supported the pledge of confidentiality in Gamble's reinstatement, saying that state law prevented him from discussing personnel matters.

Feizer Mills, a senior who attended the meeting, told Boulton that he felt the whole issue of Gamble's dismissal could have been avoided if the Division of Student Affairs had taken the Campus Y advisory board's recommendation in hiring Hatcher-Wilson as Campus Y director last summer.

Jennifer Ayer, a member of the advisory board, agreed, saying that board members had "severe reservations" about hiring Hatcher-Wilson and that as a board member, she felt her opinion wasn't considered sufficiently.

"I felt that my written recommendations were not looked at carefully," Ayer said.

Professor Charles Jenner of the biology department, who also attended the meeting, said faculty members also were dissatisfied with how Hatcher-Wilson was hired. Jenner is not a member of the advisory board, but he said faculty representatives on the board had expressed their dissatisfaction to him.

Boulton said administrators in the Division of Student Affairs made the final decision in hiring Hatcher-Wilson because of a University policy that University personnel must be hired by a University official.

"But I don't believe that anyone was excluded from that process," Boulton said. "I don't think the process was meant to exclude anybody."

Toward the beginning of the meeting, Boulton said he recognized that students' dissatisfaction with his office went beyond the Gamble issue.

"I have a feeling . . . that there are a lot of areas where this has happened," he said. "I can only speak for myself, but I will say that I care and I know a lot of other people care, too."

"I know that over the past two years, I have lost touch with students. I intend to do a better job of getting in touch with each of you and the concerns that you have."

Boulton said he partly faulted himself for the lack of understanding between students and student affairs. "You shouldn't have to learn (how the division works) by luck," he said. "We haven't done a good enough job of telling you who's in charge."

When asked to list concrete ways he would improve communication between his office and students, Boulton said, "I'm starting with me, and I'm going to talk to my staff. I don't have all the solutions. I need your input."

Rudy Colledoro-Mansfield, a Campus Y member at large, said one of the main problems with the Division of Student Affairs was that it operated on "administrative time," not student time.

"Student affairs seems to co-opt issues in a committee that's not going to meet for a few months," Colledoro-Mansfield said. "It seems that the position of student affairs is to wait until we graduate."

Boulton disagreed. "I have never stalled or tried to stall in any way," he said. "I don't operate that way."

University procedures are often at fault in the slowness of the decision-making process, he said. "It isn't just student affairs that's saying let's put the brakes on."

After the meeting, students said they didn't think Boulton had given them any answers to their problems.

"I heard a lot of avoiding of answers," Campus Y member Sue Kuhn said. "But I think it's important that things are being brought out in the open — not so much so that Dean Boulton can hear them, but because it gives . . . students a chance to bring together a lot of scattered experiences."

Katzenstein, who organized the meeting, said: "I think it was an exceptional gesture on Dean Boulton's part to come here."

"I think . . . (his answers to student questions) were very carefully calculated to act as a yeast tablet to suppress our appetite. We're not any happier than we were . . . (before the meeting) except for the fact that communication levels are clearer."

Katzenstein said he was disappointed
