most popular among students according to Gless.

"I think that's primarily because you don't have to depend on a foreign language to study there," he said.

France and Germany are also very popular countries for the study abroad programs.

Hugh Huff, associate director of Program Planning at the Division of Extension and Continuing Education, said, "I think the programs are different enough that we'd like to think of them all as popular."

Despite the threat of European terrorism the number of applicants has not really declined, Huff said.

"I think there were some dropouts right at the beginning," he said. "Some people changed (their minds), I think, mainly because their folks didn't want them to go. But it has not been a lot."

Lalik, who has been working for the past months at a communications company, said she has been saving up her money to return to Spain.

"It was wonderful," she said. "I'm dying to go back. I have friends there, and I just made a call to Spain yesterday."

Gless said that students on scholarships or financial aid do not have to worry about losing the aid if they go abroad. Students don't have to go through the hassles of readmission because the Student Leave Policy applies to those studying abroad with these programs, he said.
