

Aliens

carrying the "United States all the way" theme.

Another flaw is the character of Ripley. In the first film, Ripley was a more cunning, sensitive and emotional character. In the second film, she starts out to be emotionally scarred from the first trauma, but is more than willing to run through an empty space station full of flesh-hungry aliens a mere 15 minutes into the plot. Her character has lost its well-roundedness and has become a fighting machine more than the intelligent space officer that Weaver portrayed in the original film.

The plot also needed some remedial work. The story was far too predictable throughout the entire film. Some of the same plot devices, such as the last alien getting sucked out the freight hatch and "The Company" placing someone to look after its financial interests rather than worrying if they are going to be alien chow, also needed work.

The film did have some high points. Some of the machinery, such as a forklift suit with which Ripley fights the alien and a shoebox-shaped tank that mows down a few aliens, are fun to watch. There are enough scares and shocks in the film to keep the audience waiting to see what will happen next without having much drag on the scene progressions.

After overlooking the macho "we can protect and do everything" garbage that sometimes clouds the plot, "Aliens" is deserving of a viewing, if only to see the creative sets and the designs of the aliens themselves.

Milton's First Summer Give-A-Way!

Prices too crazy to call it anything else. It's Milton's new policy to move out the entire inventory regardless of how much it hurts.
