out what we learn when we need it." Ornstein said it is necessary to organize material so that it can be recalled in a variety of ways. If there is no structure inherent in study material, a student should create a personalized structure of his own for

"Cued recall" is one way material can be stored for extraordinarily good memory, Ornstein said. Cued recall pairs terms or concepts with short explanations of them. When test material is learned throught this method, said Ornstein, remembrance is very good.

Mnemonic devices may also be helpful in organizing material for memory storage, according to Ornstein. The use of acronyms to remember words or concepts that are difficult to link together is a simple mnemonic device. For instance, a list of causes of the Civil War could be remembered by an acronym out of the first letters of each cause: STEW (slavery, traditions, economic factors, way of thinking).

Henry Ellis, a professor of psychology at the University of New Mexico, is a specialist in memory. In a recent issue of the Monitor, a publication for professional psychologists, Ellis advocates the use of acronyms to help students remember test material.

He even uses an acronym to describe an approach to learning and retaining material. ARESIDORI stands for attention, rehearsal, elaboration, semantic processing, imagery, distinctiveness, organization, retrieval and interest.

"My approach is to get each student to review his own study habits to see to what extent they are effective, or less so, in applying these principles or strategies in their own situation," Ellis said.

But what about the student who finds himself in a bind and can only cram for an exam? Lowman said that there is really no advice he can give. "You are asking your brain to do something that it can't do very well," he said. "I can only suggest that you take lots of breaks. And try starting ahead of time and stay ahead."

Avoiding anxiety and stopping early the night before the test are two other bits of advice Lowman gives. "After you have studied for a few hours for a test, sit down, read a good book or watch a little TV. Just relax. If you aren't full of anxiety, you will score much better on your test than if you are all keyed a year which does cut down on time, if not lines, is an electronic mail scanner, Williams said.

The scanner, shared with the Records and Registration Office, posts mail the same day as it is received, he said, which is about twice as fast as when mail was posted by hand. As a result, students receive their bills quicker.

Although people like to place the blame on the Cashier's Office for many of their troubles, Barnard said, the blame is often misdirected. "As long as we collect for other departments where students feel they've gotten a 'raw deal,' " he said, "we will have an unpopular image."

Student misunderstanding?

Misunderstanding the system is usually the basis of the troubles, said Dianne Crabill, associate vice chancellor for finance, the department that oversees the Cashier's Office.

expecting a large crowd. According to Lindsey Payne, Circle K president, "It's one of the best ways on campus to get rid of the mid-term blahs." from page 1

Organizers say they are once again the state fund. That fund is audited, as well as all the separate departments. If there are any problems, Barnard said, it comes back to the Cashier's Office.

The Office also has very conscientious personnel, he said. Many have been with the Cashier's Office more than ten years. A few have been there 20 or 25 years, he said.

"We've maintained our staff one of the longest of any department on campus," he said, "with very little turn-over."

Womble said the employees' ages range from 21 to 65, and one of the employees, Preston Wicker, who has been with the Cashier's Office for 13 years, is to retire this year at age 65.

"It makes you feel younger to deal with young people," she said. "You have younger ideals."

Since the University has a policy allowing all employees to take one course per semester free, Womble said she takes courses sometimes to update herself in her work. The last course she took was on word processing.

Barnard said good relations with faculty and the other departments allow them to do their job well. "At one time the faculty was out in left field," he said. "But now they work with the staff very well."

The Cashier's Office really appreciates the students, he said. "If they weren't here," Barnard said, "we wouldn't be here."
