Trial

to pass by a simple majority.

Ahlschwede said the congress would call the Student Congress speaker who first initiated the 20 percent clause to see why it was introduced.

"That would give us a better sense about what it means," she said. "If his intent is not being reached, we need to find another goal."

Jody Beasley (Dist. 16), last year's finance committee chairman, said that the discrepancy between feepaying students and enrolled students had never been addressed in an election - so Lisk did not know the difference.

But the congress' constitution doesn't need to be clarified further, Beasley said. "We have addressed all theoretical possibilites," he said, "and we have to leave some things up to the judgment of the elected official and leave some room for flexibility.

"It says in the elections law that only fee-paying students can vote," he said. "It's just a matter of reading it and taking it as the truth. It doesn't need to be clarified more.

"Next year, there may be another classification of a non-fee-paying student, and we'd have to change the law again next year," Beasley said.

Many laws can be challenged because of the various points of view from which they can be interpreted, he said. "If they (the Sports Club) had got the 20 percent (when the turnout was first calculated) and won, I doubt seriously if we'd have a trial," he said.

"It's constitutional because the law was set by congress who has the power given in the constitution to set all election laws," Beasley said.

Another situation in which an Elections Board chairman had to make a decision based on an election law was the 1986 case of Student Body President candidate David Brady. He was accused of exceeding the campaign spending limit outlined in the elections laws.

Bruce Lillie, Elections Board chairman at the time, decided that Brady had not known about the expenditures which pushed him over the limit.

Beasley said Lillie's decision had been based on vague election laws which left too much room for individual interpretation. Because of this, Beasley said, the court upheld Lillie's decision.

Court members could not suggest that the campaign spending law be clarified, but Beasley said they made it "fairly clear" in their decision that the law needed clarification.

As a result of that incident, he said, the entire election law section of the congress' constitution was reconstructed.

Beasley said he did not expect laws to be changed because of the suit brought by the Sports Club Council.

Mason will live on campus until she can move back into her room, she said. "I'm either going to stay with the area director or with some friends."

The residents of Alderman have been very supportive, Mason said. "When I came back they had bags of clothes and soap and toothpaste," she said. "People have even been

Burnout

Feb. 25 town council meeting, and a "yes" vote isn't likely, said fraternity members and officals who have talked about the issue for months.

Johnny Biggers, Burnout cochairman, said the fraternity has explored the possibility of having the party on Ehringhaus field but University officials have not been consulted yet.

Assistant Town Manager Ron Secrist said last year's party had serious problems resulting in complaints, even though the fraternity had tried to follow the stipulations set forth when the permit was granted.

Residents living near Finley Golf Course and across N.C. 54 complained of the noise. "The noise traveled some distance," Secrist said. Also, residents of a subdivision in the area complained of partygoers parking in front of their homes. Revelers also "encroached" on the golf course during a tournament, he said.

Gold said the complaints warrant the town's attention. "People have the right to have their neighborhoods left intact," he said.

Furniture, 4521 Chapel Hill Blvd., Durham, N.C. 27707, M-F 10.6

Town officals also demand that an alcohol policy to discourage underage drinkers be enforced, Gold said. Gerlach said he doubts the Phi Kapps can be held responsible for underage drinking if they don't supply alcohol at the party. "Nobody's able to deal with that adequately," he said. "People drink at football games, concerts and bars and you can't stop it."

Gold says town police hired by the fraternity can't sit idly by while people break the law. "If there are 2,000 people and (the officers) know 75 percent of them are underage . . . it puts an extra responsibility on us."

Gerlach said that the blowout hasn't caused any "major" problems in its 10-year history, and that it is different in spirit from other fraternity parties that sometimes get out of control. "It's just before exams and people are all really happy, and
