Hannay said audience members are likely to hear a new emphasis on lyricism. "The music today is melodious, rhythmically exciting, and harmoniously attractive," he said. He said there is a new accessibility in creative arts in general that has appeared in chamber music, and the result is that modern music is far removed from what was known as modern music 20 years ago.

Hannay will have his own piece, "The Nightingale and the Rose," performed during the forum. He said it is a theater piece, or music with a dramatic story without being a simple song or a full-scale opera.

Hannay's piece, for flute, soprano, guitar and double bass, is an adaptation of a fairy tale by Oscar Wilde. The performers will recite the narrative as they play, so the sounds and the words of the drama are incorporated, he said.

Other artists at the forum will include Walter Ross, from the University of Virginia. His piece, "Rated X," for flute and bass, will be performed.

Two music composition graduates of UNC will also have their music performed. James Moberly, now teaching at the University of Missouri, will help perform two pieces that will include recorded sounds.

Michael Kallstrom, now teaching at the Westminster Choir College, will help perform selections from his piece "Wind, Water, Flame," for bass-baritone, piano and pre-recorded audio.

Forum concerts will be held in Hill Hall Auditorium today at 8 p.m. and Saturday at 1 and 8 p.m.
