Mike Helpingstine, director of JTS Promotions, said the firm had not joined in a licensing agreement with the University because he and his brother did not believe the licensing law was legal. "We've always felt from Day One that (the law) was illegal," he said.

But Carolina Pride manager Cathy Sapp had a different opinion. Carolina Pride is another Franklin Street business that sells UNC-oriented merchandise.

"I feel that if it's the law, it should be complied with," Sapp said. She said that Carolina Pride had always been licensed with the University.

"We pay thousands of dollars a year in royalties, and we have ever since we opened our doors," she said. "If we have to do it, I think everyone should have to do it."

Helpingstine said that he felt that Johnny T-Shirt already paid enough royalties when they bought merchandise from manufacturers who had licensing agreements with the University.

"We pay an immense amount of royalties to the manufacturers we buy from," he said.

Helpingstine said that he and his brother Chuck may hold a press conference in the next two weeks to announce their response to the lawsuit.

"We've always had a good relationship with the University," he said. "They just want to resolve this question once and for all . . . it just comes down to the fact that we don't believe in (the license law), and I guess now we'll have to fight in court to find out who's right."
