

Joe Bob

was eaten by outer-space porcupine monsters, and he finds a bunch of eggs in there with green slime on them and sells em back to the local junk shop, where they sit till the day-care lady decides they'd be perfect to be painted up for Easter eggs by all her little yard monsters. So pretty soon we got flesh-eating, telephone-pole-devouring, meat-chewing, outer-space alien babies hidden all over town, ready to spring up out of the weeds and eat various members of the Chamber of Commerce.

Fortunately, the same outer-space bounty hunters renewed their contracts with New Line Cinema and arrive on Earth with giant hand-held porcupine bazookas, ready to Orkin the little boogers into sesame seeds. Only one problem: this time the Critters can make themselves into a ball the size of Cleveland and steam-roll their way through the way like an urban renewal project. AND they've learned their lesson. The little porcupine tumbleweeds set up road-blocks on all roads leading out of town — and they chew through all the phone wires. I think you know what we're dealing with here. Chewy Goopy White Meat. Yum.

Five breasts. Eight dead bodies. Dog-food spoon licking. A 37 on the Vomit Meter. Critter squishing. Grotesque Easter-bunny eating. One hundred dead Crites. Gratuitous Freddy Meisterbrau. Gratuitous Freddy Krueger promotion (same company). Hamburger Factory Fu. Steamroller fu. Kamikaze space alien Fu. Drive-In Academy Awards for Herta Ware, as Nana the day-care lady, for saying "We need fiber for a healthy B.M.," Roxanne Kernohan, as the alien who turns herself into a Playboy center-fold, for figuring out how to jerk the staple out of her stomach; Barry Corbin, as the Sheriff who got fired for fightin the Critters in the first movie, for saying "I'm back!" even though he's NOT back, cause M. Emmet Walsh was the Sheriff in the first movie; Don Opper, as Charlie, everybody's favorite dimwit space alien, for saying "You see, Brad I gotta go where the cosmic winds blow me."

It's no "Critters I" but — three stars. Joe Bob says check it out.
