

Marley, INXS provide evening of reggae and rock

Someone forgot to tell Michael Hutchence one of the cardinal rules here: don't throw the cards!

Hutchence threw them anyway; cards with the words of the INXS song, "Mediate," on them into the audience. Yep, just like the video. Obviously, Carolina fans got the idea from him, right?

INXS filled the Smith Center Friday night with loyal, cheering fans and gave them exactly what they wanted — songs just like the album cuts, one right after another, with barely a pause in between.

And the audience loved it. Opening for them were Ziggy Marley and the Melody Makers, who played fun electric reggae with indistinguishable lyrics and strong background beats for an hour. Unpretentious Marley obviously had crowds of fanatics apart from the INXS maniacs. His fans stood and danced the entire time. Gradually, others stood, affected by the rhythm, if not the words.

Marley's biggest response came from singing "Tomorrow People," a song played so often on MTV and pop stations that most people jumped up, if they weren't up by then.

Between sets, MTV presented a short film of senseless clips, ads and music. The crowd breathed a sigh of relief when this audio assault ended.

INXS just sauntered on stage after drummer Jon Ferriss began the beat of "What You Need," one of their most popular songs to date. Without a moment to spare, they launched into a series of songs from their latest album, Kick, which has been on the Rolling Stone charts for more than 35 weeks. By the time the concert ended, INXS had played every song from that album.

Hutchence, the obvious spokesman, finally acknowledged the crowd by yelling, "Hello, North Carolina!" In no time, INXS enthusiastically launched into another song, and the crowd yelled along every time.

One song done very well was "Shine Like It Does," which Hutchence dubbed "the hippy song for the night," with Kirk Pengilly playing acoustic guitar. Before anyone could respond, the rest of the band was back for "Wild Life." Soon afterward, Hutchence released his hair from the ponytail and caused bunches of teenage girls to go berserk.

The second-to-last song in the set was the tour title, "Calling All Nations." They left the stage after only a little more than an hour of play, but they'd crammed fifteen songs into that time. As expected, the crowd sustained a steady roar for five minutes until the band returned for a long encore, blasting through "Kick" into the medley of "Need You Tonight/Mediate."

They finished with "Never Tear Us Apart," complete with a maddening, lights-out pause that seemed to last forever while everyone changed positions. Cards were not the only mementos that fanatics took home with them; they could also choose from water cups, the roses from Hutchence's hair, drumsticks and a pair of underwear thrown onto the stage. He threw the underwear back but never picked up the Carolina blue thing also tossed onto the stage.

There is no doubt in the world that INXS is a superb group of musicians — sounding polished, clear and energetic. The talent shown by Andrew on keyboards, Tim on lead guitar and Jon Farris — combined with Garry Gary Beers on bass, Kirk Pengilly on everything else and Hutchence up front — was amazing.

Their popularity is reflected in their following — people of all ages. They all danced the same way, with their eyes glued on the stage and singing along all the way.

The older fans may have been disappointed by the absence of some of the very early '80s material, such as selections from Shaboo, Shoo-bah, which clearly wouldn't have been out of place in the set they played.

Still, the only albums they represented — The Swing, Listen Like Thieves and Kick — showed a wealth of Australian talent. INXS has got what it takes, in the studio and on the road, giving you what you need!
