Dry Rush

two-man teams who visit approximately four to five houses each night. They go in, introduce themselves to the rush chairman or fraternity president and ask to be shown around. If they encounter alcohol, they notify the chairman or president that there is a violation.

The IFC enforcement team and the Greek life office make sure dry rush is enforced at the University of Georgia, said Ron Binder, adviser to fraternities at Georgia.

"We had two violations this year." The punishments for fraternities who violate the policy are fines, having their social privileges removed and/or having their intramural privileges revoked, Binder said.

Neither the University of Michigan nor the University of Virginia have a dry rush policy, although officials at Michigan are working on implementing such a policy.

"There haven't been any singular incidents as results of having wet rush," said Grant Davidson, fraternity coordinator at Michigan. "We are trying to implement a dry rush policy because of the liability issues, the fact that underage people are frequently at the parties and the negative image aspect."

Brian Owens, president of the IFC at the University of Virginia, said there were a few nights of expressively dry rush, but otherwise the decision was left up to the fraternity.

Georgia's Binder said that there were some students who wanted to go back to wet rush, but that neither fraternities nor rushees could make a quality decision when alcohol is involved.

Professor pens pencil saga

From Associated Press reports

Drawing on two years of research, Duke professor Henry Petroski has written a 450-page book on the pencil, whose importance he says has been ignored too long.

Petroski's book "The Pencil: A History of Design and Circumstance" is

"We've gone to dry rush, and every year we've set a record with the number of people coming through rush," Binder said.

Barnes said dry rush helped the fraternities.

"They don't have to spend as much money or deal with a bunch of drunks while giving bids. They know that most people who come are coming for rush."

Robertson said there had been no complaints about dry rush at Clemson. "It's been dry for so long, people expect it."

slated for release in January. Among the unusual facts Petroski found are:

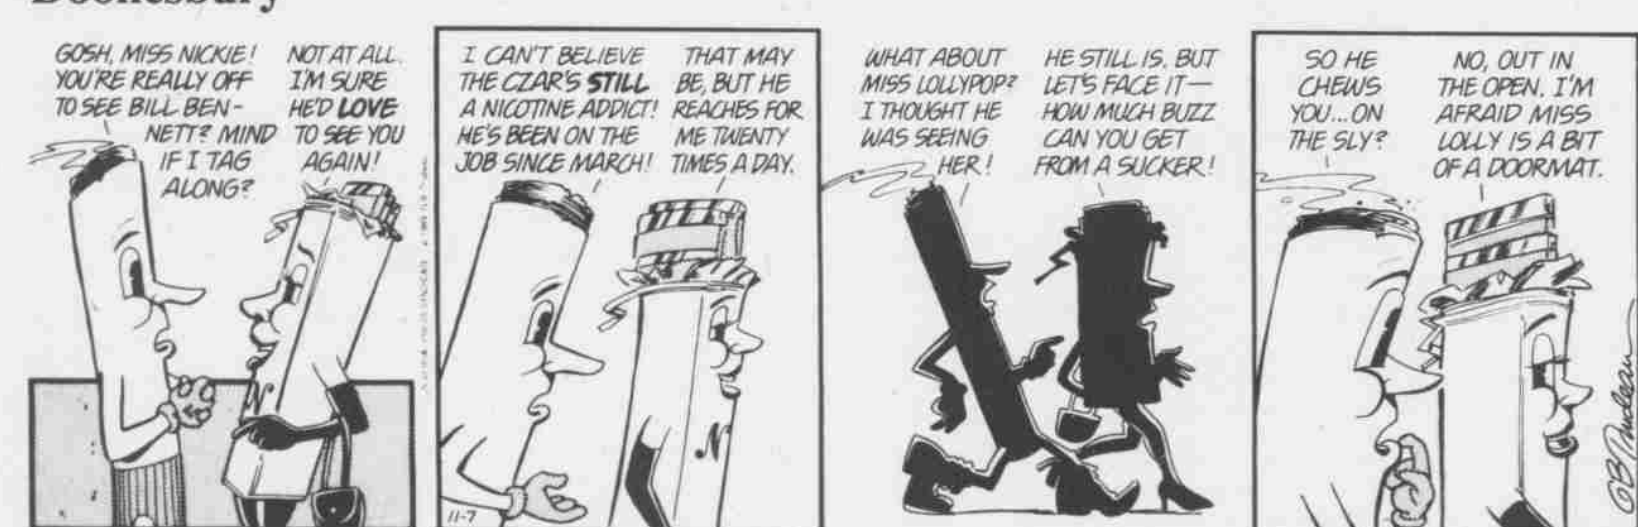

- A single pencil is capable of drawing a line 70 miles long;
- Erasers didn't appear on pencils until about 100 years ago. "People said if they had erasers, they would be encouraged to make mistakes."
