Nicaraguan voters take bold step

By WENDY BOUNDS
 Staff Writer

Congratulating the Nicaraguan people for their steadfastness and patriotism, Secretary of State James Baker Tuesday called Sunday's electoral outcome in Nicaragua another win for freedom.

The surprising defeat of President Daniel Ortega and his Sandinista party by opposition leader Violeta Barrios de Chamorro is the beginning of a new era of peace for the Nicaraguan people, Baker said.

"We hope (Sunday's) elections will mark the beginning of permanent peace and democracy for the people of Nicaragua," Baker said.

Final vote tabulations gave Chamorro 55 percent of the vote and Ortega 41 percent. The remaining four percent was divided among several minor candidates.

In a statement Monday, President George Bush said he was most pleased that there had been a free and fair election in Nicaragua and that the results were being accepted on both sides.

The election's outcome is a wonderful thing for the people of Nicaragua, said Joshua Muravchik, a resident scholar at American Enterprise in Washington D.C.

Analysis

"For the first time in a long time, perhaps ever, they (the people) have an opportunity to rule themselves," Muravchik said.

The U.S. helped make the election happen by supporting the Contras, Muravchik said. Ortega's Sandinistas were bitterly opposed to elections because history had chosen them to rule the country.

"What reversed their decision was their desperate need to liquidate the Contras," Muravchik said.

If the Sandinistas allowed free elections, the U.S. would stop supporting the Contras, he said.

Despite Sunday's elections, the Sandinistas remain Nicaragua's largest political force with control of the military and police.

Although Ortega said he would not block Chamorro from the presidency, he has said he would still try to rule the country from below, Muravchik said.

"The U.S. must work diplomatically to get other organizations to put pressure on the Sandinistas to step down," Muravchik said.

In a press statement issued by his press office, Ortega said his order for a unilateral halt of all offensive military operations was aimed at encouraging the Contras to demobilize quickly and quietly.

Chamorro also told Honduras-based rebels to put down their weapons.

The U.S. congratulated the United National Opposition (UNO) and Chamorro for their victory.

"We congratulate Mrs. Chamorro and all of the good brave people in the UNO coalition on their victory," Baker said. "But we also commend Ortega and the Sandinistas for carrying out this commitment to conduct elections under international supervision."

There is space in a democratic Nicaragua for the expression of all political points of view, Bush said.

"We hope all sides in this hotly fought contest will extend a hand of reconciliation and cooperation in rebuilding the country for all Nicaragua," Bush said.

Reintegration vowed for Contras

From Associated Press reports

WASHINGTON — Merging Nicaragua's Contra rebels back into their country's political life is a delicate problem but one that will be resolved, perhaps with the mediation of Roman Catholic Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo, Secretary of State James Baker said Wednesday.

"The war is over" in Nicaragua, Baker told the Senate Budget Committee, despite lingering mistrust by longtime foes. Baker noted that a bipartisan policy agreement between the administration and Congress last year called for "voluntary reintegration" of the U.S.-supported rebels into their homeland under safe and democratic conditions.

With Sunday's election victory by opposition presidential candidate Violeta Chamorro, and a request by her and defeated Sandinista President Daniel Ortega for the rebels to disband, "those conditions are now rapidly being created," Baker said.

However, he added that "years of distrust" have created "legitimate fears on both sides that should be addressed." Baker said he hoped Obando y Bravo in Managua "would be able to play a role in resolving this issue," along with the United Nations and the Organization of American States.

"We want to avoid a standoff with each side demanding that the other go first," Baker said.

In Nicaragua a day earlier, Rafael Solis, a high-ranking military commander, said the Sandinistas would not give up control of the police or Central America's largest army until the Contras disband. Meanwhile, Contra leader Israel Galeano said from Honduras, where thousands of the rebels are based across the border, that they would not disband until after Mrs. Chamorro is inaugurated April 25.

On Capitol Hill, Baker said he hoped Congress, for which Nicaragua has been the most divisive foreign policy issue of the past decade, would not start a political debate about demobilization of the rebels.

"It would be unfortunate ... if we now divided on this very complex and sensitive and delicate issue by drawing lines in the sand about who ought to go first," Baker said.

Asked whether the administration has contingency plans in case the Sandinistas seek to retain power over the nation's military and security apparatus, Baker said: "That's a contingency that isn't likely. Frankly, it just isn't going to happen. That's all going to work out."

Baker used his appearance before the committee to issue a call, as well, for a new bipartisan approach to another Central American country where policy has proven divisive, El Salvador. The fall from power of the Sandinistas, who have provided weapons and other support for Salvador's leftist FMLN guerrillas, opens new opportunities for peace there as well, Baker said.

"It is important we not divide on El Salvador," he said.

But when Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, D-La., asked whether a lessening in tensions might lead to a cut in U.S. military aid to El Salvador's government, Baker demurred.

Changes in longstanding conflicts "don't necessarily translate immediately into changes in the nature of our assistance," Baker said. Rather, military aid may be becoming "a more valuable tool in addressing regional threats," he said.
