Study says 1 in 500 students has AIDS virus

From Associated Press reports
BOSTON — About one in 500 U.S. college students is infected with the AIDS virus, and further spread of the deadly disease is likely on campuses unless students change their sex habits, a study concludes.

Based on the new findings, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control estimates that between 25,000 and 35,000 college students are infected with HIV, the AIDS virus.

"Risky behaviors are occurring, and now we know we have the infection. It is cause for concern and appropriate attention," said Dr. Helene D. Gayle, who directed the study.

The CDC study is the first nationwide attempt to judge the presence of HIV on college campuses, said co-author Dr. Richard P. Keeling of the American College Health Association.

It shows that the virus is probably about as common there as in the public at large.

However, the researchers cautioned that AIDS could still spread dramatically among college students, just as some other sexually transmitted diseases have done.

"I think probably the most important thing from this study is that it shows us the potential," said Keeling. "The combination of a sexually transmitted disease tossed into campus behavior has the potential for very serious consequences in the future. It also shows us we have an opportunity to prevent that."

The study was based on random testing of blood samples drawn from 16,863 students at 19 schools, most of them large state universities. It found that two-tenths of 1 percent of the students were infected with the virus.

"This is both good news and bad news," commented Leighton Ku, a public health specialist at the Urban Institute in Washington.

"It's good that it's not sky high, as some might have feared. But it's bad that it's there at all."

Among other results of the study, published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine:

■ Overall, the survey found 30 AIDS-infected students. All but two of them were men.

■ The infection rate was half of 1 percent for men and two-hundredths of 1 percent in women.

■ Those over age 24 were seven times more likely than younger students to be infected.

■ At 10 of the 19 campuses, the survey turned up no AIDS infections at all.

The researchers noted that the risk of AIDS for college students is far lower than among some other groups, such as male homosexuals and drug abusers.

"The potential clearly exists, however, for the further spread of HIV infection in this population, and preventive measures are needed," they wrote.

Keeling said the study underscores the need to persuade college students to use condoms, limit the number of their sexual partners and otherwise reduce their risk of becoming infected.

"Our concern is that now that we have documented the presence of HIV on college campuses," he said, "it is essentially a reservoir from which the virus can spread to other people if we do not succeed in changing behavior."

Keeling, who also runs the student health service at the University of Virginia, said students often feel as though AIDS is something that does not concern them. Other factors that may enhance the spread of the virus include widespread casual sex, poor skill at negotiating safe sex practices and the frequent combination of sex while drinking, which makes people less cautious.

However, Ku participated in a recent study that found that condom use among teenagers has doubled during the past decade.

Dr. Steven Weinstein of the University of Massachusetts Medical Center recommended more intensive programs by colleges to change students' behavior and attitudes toward sex, drugs and alcohol.

"We want to create a new milieu on campus, where safer sex is the in thing, and it is unacceptable to be blitzed out of your mind," he said.

The study was based on testing of blood samples drawn for other purposes at student health centers. Even though the researchers promised not to reveal AIDS rates at individual campuses, Keeling said many schools refused to participate because they feared being labeled as "an AIDS college."

Universities that took part were Central Missouri State, Emory, Mississippi State, Northwestern, Rutgers, San Diego State, Southern Illinois, California at Berkeley, Colorado, Connecticut at Storrs, Georgia, Kansas, Maryland at Baltimore County, Maryland at College Park, Massachusetts at Amherst, New Hampshire, Southern California, Texas at Austin and the University of Washington.

Draft not necessary to augment forces in gulf

By KAREN DIETRICH
Staff Writer

Although military reserves are being used extensively, the Gulf Crisis will not require the U.S. government to reinstitute a draft in the near future, according to government officials.

"We have the manpower required to carry out the mission in the Middle East," said a representative of the Armed Services Newsdesk.

The Department of the Army did issue a moratorium on discharges of all army personnel last Friday, but this should not be taken as an indication of an impending draft, experts say.

"The latest we've heard is that we're not going to reinstate a draft. There would have to be some circumstances unforeseen at this time," said Lt. Col. Ron Deaver, Commander of the Raleigh U.S. Army Recruiting Battalion.

"The draft is a dirty word (at the Pentagon)," he added. "The volunteer army has been extremely successful. It has exceeded everyone's expectations." A draft is only likely in the case of a full-scale war, experts say.

"(A draft) is likely in case of a general war with full mobility. First we would see the call up of more of the reserves and the National Guard," said Commander Guy Connell, Executive Officer of Naval ROTC at UNC.

There has been a great deal of discussion about the draft on campus, said Robert Rupen, political science professor at UNC.

"When you don't use the draft, there is the question of whether the brunt is being borne by the blacks. Also, the class business - no college kids, or very few, (are in the service)," Rupen said. "There has been some talk and pressure, but I...doubt that it will happen," he said.

"It also may turn out that there will be some relation with how the economy is going," Rupen added. "If there is a downturn in the economy with more unemployment, there will be more people (voluntarily entering the service)."

UNC senior David Pearson said he did not consider the possibility of a draft until the military started cutting off discharges from the service.

"Now that they are not rotating, I'm getting a little worried, but I think there would only be (a draft) if it's dragged out for a long time," he said.

Morgan Whitney, UNC senior, said he did not expect a draft. "I can't see Saddam Hussein turning this into a war that's going to require that kind of a military commitment," he said.

Many UNC students said they would be unwilling to fight for the U.S. cause in the Middle East in the event of war.

"I have no clear indication of why we're there, and I think it's unconstitutional for all this to be happening without Congressional approval," Pearson said. "I would only consider going if Congress declared war."

A UNC junior who asked not to be identified said he would not fight for this cause. "I would go down to the police station, or whatever, and put myself in prison," he said. "If the cause were more legit... I'd be there, but there's no way I would go."

Whitney said he would take the opposite approach.

"If I knew a draft was coming up... I'd go ahead and join the Navy in some communications factor, or I'd fill out deferment papers," Whitney said. "I love my country a lot, but I don't want to come home in a box... I'm not sure that this particular conflict is one that I want to put my life on the line for."

Senior Steve Grasberger was the only student interviewed who said he would readily enter the service in case of a draft. "I've given it some thought, and I decided... that I would probably volunteer before they call me," he said.
