UNC JV basketball gives small-college players big-college educations

By Stewart Chisam
Staff Writer

By now, Pearce Landry could have lit up scoreboards all across the country.

He could have jetted from Page High School in Greensboro and suited up for Davidson, or UNC-Wilmington, or even Harvard — traveled to places like Annapolis and New Haven and Princeton.

He could have used his 3-point shot to see the country.

Instead, the freshman shooting guard has settled into his second semester at North Carolina.

After forsaking numerous basketball scholarship offers in order to come to UNC as a Morehead Scholar, Landry has become a star, of sorts. He's established himself as perhaps the best player on the UNC junior varsity basketball team.

Now he's sitting back and waiting. Maybe next year, and certainly the year after that, Landry will get a shot at the varsity — a shot to travel to Atlanta and College Park and Madison Square Garden.

Maybe he'll make it. Maybe he won't. It really doesn't matter.

"I'll try to learn the system these first two years and see what I can do the third," Landry said as he looks to move up a rung on the UNC basketball ladder.

For now, he's savoring his shot at the mini-time.

"Not many people get to play any kind of basketball after high school," he said.

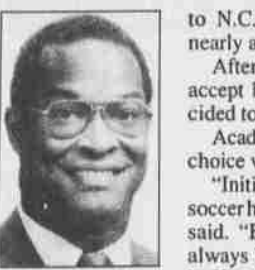

"You graduate and that's your last day of playing. If (the JV team) keeps a lot of hopes alive for some guys."

More than anything, the JV team is about that — about keeping hopes alive.

Many team members are like Landry — people who forsook chances at basketball glory elsewhere to capitalize on UNC's scholastic opportunities.

"I just came here for academics," said sophomore guard Fred Womble, who could also capture an open spot on the varsity next season. "I love to play basketball — but first is my education. My mom really wants me to do well here. Of course, she also wants me to have fun, play basketball, and get to know people."

Touré Claiborne, an all-state soccer player in high school, could have gone to N.C. Wesleyan for basketball, or nearly anywhere for soccer.

Randy Wiel

After Cornell, his first choice, didn't accept him, the Greenville native decided to come to North Carolina.

Academics were a given. Claiborne's choice was which sport to focus on.

"Initially, I was supposed to play soccer here," the 6-foot-4, 196-pounder said. "But basketball is something I always loved, and I decided to go with it. I've always wanted to work hard at basketball."

That's the other constant on this team — a love for the game.

In many ways, the JV team is structured like a Division III program. No scholarships are given to the players, and therefore they tend to keep a realistic approach to the game. They play hard; they practice hard; they love to win. But when it's all over, they hit the books, preparing for jobs as lawyers and doctors and coaches, or whatever else suits their aspirations.

The team's head coach, seventh-year varsity assistant Randy Wiel, beams about his former players' accomplishments.

"One of the things I really enjoy," Wiel said, "is that over the last five years, five of the players are right now in medical school or doing their interns.

That's pretty good.

"That's always nice for a coach. I don't have to worry about their academics."

Beyond the books, however, still lingers the dream of basketball glory.

In a given week, the JVs practice as many hours as the varsity, although the JVs, unlike their scholarship counterparts, have longer breaks for holidays such as Thanksgiving and Christmas.

The JVs run many of the varsity plays, and when they lose, they swear and rant; when they win, they hoot and holler, just like the varsity.

"Some people think that it's just an intramural-type thing," Claiborne said. "But we go just as hard, just as long as the varsity does. We take it very seriously, just as if we were members of the varsity team here at the University."

Unlike the varsity, which plays for a conference and national championship, the JVs play just for the fun of it, really. Most ACC schools don't field JV teams, so the Tar Heels play mainly community and junior colleges. One or two prep schools also fill a year's schedule.

Traditionally, most of the JV players are freshmen or sophomores. The coaches keep it that way so as many students as possible can have a chance to play. After two years with the JVs, players receive a varsity tryout. Some players — like Travis Stephenson, Jason Burgess and Larry Smith on this year's squad — make the varsity.

Others move on to intramurals and YMCA ball.

Still, each player goes away knowing he's earned the Carolina blue uniform.

"I think a JV team is a great addition to any college," junior Edgar Farmer said. "I don't think any one of us will ever forget our experience on this team."

"I think it's something that will last forever, and it's something we can tell our grandkids."
