The last time I motored out to visit Ethel, dear old school chum that she is, it was a cold blustry day, and I was indeed glad to shed my furs and nestle in the big wing chair before her fireplace, warming my hands over the cheerful blaze.

When Ethel joined me before the fireplace, she was delightful in a tan linen dress which she had made herself during the summer months.

By the time baby's nap time came around we were living the old days over again and planning wonderful re-unions for our frat girls during the winter. Finally Ethel looked up hesitatingly and began to tell me what had been worrying her all day.

It seems that the girl had written her, as secretary of the frat, that they would not re-organize unless a certain girl who has never been extremely popular with us resigned. This girl had been found saying very disagreeable things about other girls, and was, as the girls expressed it, far from being a desirable member.

The letter which Ethel handed me ended up in the writer's characteristic style, "Now don't be angry Ethel dear, but we feel that confirms the charge that women are 'catty,' and we think things would be more Mrs. Wm. E. Powell ...... 32,900 pleasant without her."

Ethel had investigated the matter and found things that were reported about this girl were true enough, and, moreover, that the girl declared frankly that she had said things, meant them, and would continue to talk about her fellow members every time opportunity presented itself.

All the way home I thought about the incident. So many many people say girls are "catty." Perhaps this is true. When gossip starts it makes the best of us mean and small. But I hate to think for a minute that my sex is really inclined to be jealous and spiteful. Oh friends, is it true? It rests with us, you know, to disprove that accusing statement.
