FRANK KIMBLE, Mgr.

such a manner that no one noticed him and he made every arrangement to come to the States without the formality of paying his freightage.

After he had selected a quiet little spot down in the hold of the vessel far from noise and the possibility of observation he found that he had brought food, but nothing to drink.

As he reflected over his situation he noticed a short distance from him the glint of glass bottles. He worked his way toward them and he opened one then another, and another and so on ad nauseum. It was Jamaica—the well known rum. His thirst became chronic.

When the ship began unloading the heaviest and dirtiest portion of the cargo was Mr. Brandless. While waiting for an ambulance he sang several loud songs of the billowy sea, in the midst of which he would halt to place some sturdy seaman between him and some gawdy and unspeakable New York animal.

The husband was before Magistrate Cornell because his wife accused him of holding out on the weekly payroll. "Why, your honor," shouted the husband, "that wife of mine has $500 right this minute in her stocking and yet she wants me to give up all my money to care for her."

The Magistrate peered over his glasses at the complainant. "Madam," he said sternly, "you hear what your husband says. Is this true?"

"Why, Judge," she stammered, "you can search me, I don't."

And right here the Magistrate knew it was time to take up another line of testimony.

William Barrett Ridgley, former U. S. comptroller, took a group of Wall Street friends, which included George Graham Rice, out to Bayville the other day to sail about on his yacht. They cruised about for several hours and suddenly it was discovered that Rice was missing. The yacht was stopped and there was a fear that he might have fallen overboard.

Finally they saw a head bobbing up 100 feet back of the boat. It was Rice. When he climbed on deck he was in a bathing suit. He had jumped in for a swim about an hour before and the boat got out of his reach and he had been swimming after it all the time. "Why didn't you yell for help?" he was asked. "Well, every time I would yell I would forget to swim and go under. I knew you'd miss me sooner or later."

Miss Molly Valva is a manicure girl in a down-town office building. She goes about the building polishing nails for busy men at their desks. The other day she announced that she was going to retire. In seven years she has saved only her tips. They amount to $30,000. She invested a part of it in a war stock that more than tripled itself. She thinks now that she can struggle along on a fortune of about $75,000. She has kept account of the times she received proposals of marriage. One man proposed to her every week for eight months. "I might have married him," she said, "except for one reason: I discovered that he had a perfectly good wife at home."
