"Let nothing be done through strife or vainglory; but in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves." -Philippians 2:3.

How Long Liquidation?

FREDERIC J. Haskins, veteran journalist, has compiled an encyclopedia of general information published under the title, "Five Thousand New Answers to Questions." In it is found this interesting question, "How long do depositors have to wait to recover their money, or part of it, after a bank fails?" To this Mr. Haskins replies:

"The Comptroller of the Currency says that statistics kept over a period of five years show that an average period of five years and six months is required to liquidate failed banks. The shortest time is ten months."

It would be interesting if Mr. Haskins could tell us the average cost of liquidating closed banks, but this information is not found in his questions and answers. It is common knowledge, however, that bank receiverships generally mean heavy losses for depositors as well as stockholders.

The Bank of Franklin, which failed two years and seven months ago, has avoided much of the costliness of forced liquidation through an agreement of stockholders and most of the depositors to "freeze" deposits until October of this year. This has enabled a more orderly and less expensive liquidation through a process of trading certificates of deposit for notes held by the bank. A full-time liquidating agent has not been necessary. Furthermore, the bank, by re-opening as a trust depository, has been able to perform the function of a clearing house, which besides proving of great convenience to the community, has helped considerably to delay the cost of liquidation.

The end of the period agreed on for "freezing" deposits is drawing near and everyone is wondering whether liquidation can be completed by that time. If it is not, the stockholders are certain to suffer heavy losses and it is very likely, too, that the depositors who have failed or refused to "trade out" also will experience losses, or at least a long delay in receiving their money.

But the liabilities of the Bank of Franklin have been reduced to such a minimum that it seems utterly needless that it should fail to pay out by October 1—that is, if the officers, stockholders, debtors and depositors will exert themselves to the fine efforts of which they have shown themselves capable.

Fine Advertising

ONE hundred and fifty Rotarians from all parts of South Carolina and the western half of North Carolina have gone back to their homes after a two-day assembly in Franklin. That means 150 more apostles of the mountains to spread the good name of Macon County.

What this town needs more than anything else is advertising, and the Rotary convention here Monday and Tuesday was the finest kind of advertising. As one man commented, "It was worth at least a thousand dollars to Franklin."

Regardless of the monetary value, it was a fine thing to have this splendid group of men with us and the community is grateful to the local Rotary club for its efforts in bringing the assembly here.

The whole town did nobly by itself in the way it entertained the visitors and made them welcome. There used to be some doubt whether Franklin could accommodate a convention in first class fashion. There is no room for doubt now. Let's bring some more conventions to town.

We recently took occasion in this column to compliment Dr. and Mrs. S. H. Lyle on the fine appearance of their residence since they had it painted. Since then we have observed another home which has blossomed forth with a new coat of paint—the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Lee Arnold on highway No. 28 just beyond the creamery. With a well trimmed lawn and beautiful flowering mimosa trees bordering the road, the place is worth driving out to see. Two coats of white paint have transformed the house from a drab looking dwelling to one with a smiling, inviting countenance truly in keeping with the character of its occupants.

Let's paint some more houses.
