Wireworms Damage Irish Potato Crop

Wireworms are dealing North Carolina's early Irish potato crop a heavier blow with each passing year, declares J. O. Rowell, extension entomologist at State college.

In the past little emphasis has been laid on control measures, but it now appears that immediate steps must be taken to combat this insect menace.

Rowell explained that a large number of market potatoes failed to grade No. 1 last year because of wireworm attacks. The true wireworm, which is the larval or worm stage of the click beetle, is the spud's deadliest insect enemy. Since wireworms commonly infest sod land, potatoes often suffer severely when planted on recently broken ground. Such leguminous crops as clover, alfalfa, field peas, and soybeans are not susceptible to attack. Therefore, potatoes may be planted with a reasonable degree of safety on new land following a three or four year rotation of wireworm immune crops.

Rowell pointed out that many crops such as corn, cotton, and sweet potatoes are susceptible to attack by this insect pest. When these crops follow Irish potatoes on the same land, it appears that the only means of reducing wireworm infestation in such fields is clean cultivation from October through the first of January.

In the Eastern counties where soil erosion is not a serious problem, the ground should be turned as soon as the crop is harvested or at least by the latter part of October.

In the Piedmont area there is little that can be recommended as a cultural control. It is the usual practice in this section to follow a rotation which includes small grain or corn following potatoes.
