safety, but particularly to North Carolina parents.

"Pending the fulfillment of our hope of having safety taught in every school in North Carolina, the responsibility for teaching our children safety habits must lie chiefly with their parents," said Hocutt.

The safety director pointed out that the 21 traffic fatality victims under 15 years of age included nine who were crossing or playing in the street or roadway, one who skated in front of a car, one bicyclist who disregarded a stop sign, and one child on a sled.

"If parents expect their children to walk, play, skate and ride bicycles in a safe manner, they must take it upon themselves to impress their children with the importance of safe practices and the dangers of wrong practices," Hocutt said.

"If your child rides a bicycle, see that he or she learns safe cycling habits, preferably by joining a Bicycle Club, if there is one in your community; if your child owns skates, teach him not to skate in the street; and, above all, see that your child doesn't play in the street, that he learns to look before crossing the street or road, and that he cultivates safe pedestrian habits.

"It is better that your child learns the lessons of safety through teaching, not through experience."
