Miss Rousseau Applies Her Makeup

Daughter Of Macon Native Has Lead In Outdoor Drama

Miss Dianne Rousseau, a 20-year-old brunette from North Wilkesboro and a frequent visitor here, is playing the role of Eleanor Dare, the female lead of "The Lost Colony", the outdoor drama now in its 17th season at Manteo.

The young actress is the daughter of the former Miss Tim Crawford (Mrs. Arch Rousseau), who was reared in this county, and granddaughter of Mrs. Lee Crawford.

A student of drama at Woman's College, where she is a rising junior, Miss Rousseau is the fourth native Tar Heel to play this important role in the Paul Green drama, which has survived longer than all other outdoor productions in the country.

Eleanor Dare is the mother of Virginia Dare, first child of English parentage born in this country.

"The Lost Colony" is presented on the actual site where American history's most puzzling mystery took place.

Impressions from some trips: Those signs which say, "Unmarked police cars patrolling", mean it.

How do flatlanders stand the monotony of cudzu, jack pine, and scrub oak?

Why do women play with their hair while driving? In South Carolina there are minimum speed limits. Like those posted on superhighways where the minimum is 40 m.p.h.

Every county seems to have a Bethel. I noticed one in Georgia and two in S. C.

THE TOWN of Six Mile, S. C., is 10 mile from Clemson. North Carolina can take pride not only in its school bus safety record but in the condition of the buses' physical appearance. Contrasted with several nearby states, ours look 50 per cent better.

For those interested in queer place names, how about Fairplay, S. C.

In Charlotte, there is a marker downtown on Tryon Street, imbedded right in the sidewalk. It says: "Jefferson Davis was standing on this spot April 18, 1865, when informed of Lincoln's death." How silly can marker-makers get?

IVEY'S HAS a store in Asheville, but I don't know whether they follow the same unusual—at least I regard them as unusual—practices as the parent store in Charlotte.

In the Charlotte department store, nothing pertaining to alcohol or liquor is sold. For instance, you can buy any kind of mints but rum-flavored ones. No playing cards are sold. No glasses that would be used for mixing drinks etc.

Ivey's does not advertising on Sunday. It does not allow employees to travel on company business on the Sabbath. It pulls the curtains on its window displays on that day.

ON THE fifth floor of their Charlotte store, Ivey's has set aside a meditation room. There are several religious articles in it, including a Bible. Customers may use the room at their convenience.

Proof that it is used could be seen in the guest register; proof that it is appreciated was to be found in several thank you letters shown me by a manager.

Who says the world's so materialistic and hell-bent that an honest, God-fearing man no longer stands a chance.

THE ONLY evidence I saw on July 4th that the day was being observed for what it was, was when I saw a few American flags scattered about town. Late in the afternoon, however, I came across a home that actually had decorated for the occasion.

It was Mrs. W. B. McGuire's place on Maple Street. There was blue bunting strung across the front of the wide front porch and some simple, but effective, red and white stuff to top it off. When I asked whose inspiration it was Mrs. McGuire gave credit to her 10-year-old grandson, John Cooper. He not only thought of it but executed it by himself.

A nice touch, John.
