

Locals Urged To Give Jobs To Handicapped

By Sam Colville
 "National employ the physically handicapped week" is October 5-11. Of all the various "weeks" during the course of a year, this week is one of the very few authorized by federal legislation, proclaimed by the president, by most of the governors, and by thousands of mayors. Dwight D. Eisenhower, president of the United States, says this:
 "Our nation can ill afford to lose the productive power and the talents of those who are idle today because they are disabled. We need them as active productive citizens."
 Last year 74 thousand handicapped men and women were successfully rehabilitated or restored to working condition by the state rehabilitation agencies. These people had been earning 22 million dollars a year but now they earn 148 million dollars a year. They will pay 10 dollars in federal income tax for every dollar spent on their rehabilitation.
 Why is it good business to hire the handicapped? Here are the facts. Federal and state agencies spend one million dollars each year to support men and women because they are disabled. Rehabilitation and a job for a handicapped person keeps him and his family self-supporting—helps him become a tax payer, rather than a tax user.
 It is a local proposition. It must start here at home where the handicapped persons live. In every state there is a Vocational Rehabilitation Service, which prepares handicapped people for work, and there is a Public Employment Service, through which workers find jobs and helps employers find workers.
 Employers, hire the handicapped, it's good business. Handicapped persons apply for rehabilitation and jobs.
