

HE APPRECIATES AN OLD TEACHER

community, as he has continued to the present time. Mr. Graham recalled the moral and religious life Mr. Cameron was trying to live, and to instill into the minds of the younger members of the neighborhood, and emphasized the results of that good influence on the men and women of the present day in this community who grew up under Mr. Cameron's ministrations and lead. Mr. Cameron was always on time at the Sunday school, and rarely missed a service from one year's end to another, and was always ready with a cordial greeting to welcome every member.

Mr. Graham spoke of Mr. Cameron's attitude toward liquor, against which he fought persistently, taking an active hand in every way he could to lessen its production and use. He was also antagonistic toward anything that was not in harmony with the general good of the community, and was an active champion of the right. "Through the years he has lived," said Mr. Graham, "his teaching in the little Sunday school and the life he has lived have told in the community, and his influence will be of untold value to the community and will continue long after he has passed to his reward."

"Mr. Cameron," continued Mr. Graham, "has been a man who has had an interest in his community, not from a selfish motive, but that it might be a better place for others to live, and he has spent his means freely in building up industries around in his neighborhood in order that the people might have employment, and that raw materials produced here might find a market in the town and community in which they were produced."

"He has fought for good schools, and roads all over the county, and has been among the first commissioners to help lay out some of the main roads, and in some instances he has built roads with his own means when it was not possible to get aid from the county."

Mr. Graham referred to the progress of building in the entire Vass region, much of it directly attributable to Mr. Cameron's work, including the mills, the mill town, the hotel, his farming example, the Methodist church, his influence in the schools, and in the many various ways in which his hand has been seen, and the standing in which he has always been held by his friends and neighbors.

It is needless to add that Dan Graham is not the only young fellow or old one either in this section who has a kindly feeling for A. Cameron, for that sentiment is general. Nor is it confined to his old Sunday school scholars, for it is wide spread among many who have never been in Sunday school with him for he has had many contacts with the people, and he has friends in all ranks and in all quarters.

"I think it is just as well," said Mr. Graham, "to tell a man what you think of him while he is living. I believe a little appreciation of folks while they are with you is worth more than when they have gone."
