November Meteors Are Due Next Week

If You're Up After Midnight Watch Near Constellation of Leo

Next week the November meteors are expected. They will be seen, if they come in the northeast sky, but probably not in number until after midnight. To those who are familiar with the stars they will appear in the vicinity of the constellation of Leo, popularly known in some quarters as the sickle. Look out in the direction of where the sun rises and look between midnight and daylight. If you happen to think about it earlier in the evening it will do no harm to look earlier in that direction, but probably not much good.

The return of the Leonide meteors is not certain, but if they come as they have appeared in the past it will be a sight worth staying up all night to see, for the meteors in some of the appearances within the last two centuries have brightened the eastern sky with showers of big and little stars scarcely paralleled by any exhibition in the heavens. You can begin to watch for them during the first days of the week, but the middle or latter part of the week is the period in which they will be seen in the greatest profusion if they appear at all. It is possible they will all be burned up or disappeared to join some other star. But in the past they have been encountered as the earth reached the place in its yearly journey around the sun at which it arrives next week. If they are in existence when we get there we will see them as we prowled around at night. It takes about a week to pass the point opposite the constellation of Leo.
