Indians On War Path For Tourists Scalps

The drums are quiet among the Cherokee Indians . . . but they're still after scalps, tourist scalps. The Cherokees, long a featured attraction for tourists in Western North Carolina, have decided to capitalize on the travel trade by setting up modern tourist cabins. So says Joe Jennings, acting superintendent of the Qualla Reservation.

Last November the Indians decided at a tribal meeting to profit from the influx of tourists who are pouring into the little village of Cherokee over the Blue Ridge Parkway. They will also produce genuine souvenirs—baskets, pottery, and beadwork—for sale to the visitors.

Plans are afoot to build twenty cottages for tourists in a section of the Indian land located adjacent to the Great Smoky Mountain National Park. The start of actual construction work is only awaiting Federal approval of a $150,000.00 loan, which the Cherokees have requested to see them through the project.

Other tourist attractions might eventually be made available with the cottages, including a dining room, tennis courts, an archery range, and other recreational facilities. Site of the development will be a short distance off the main Park thoroughfare, and an access road is to be built leading to the cottages.

A great part of the construction work is to be done by the Indians themselves and the majority of building materials will be obtained directly from the Indian land. Each of the twenty cottages is to be equipped with modern conveniences.

Carolina Motor Club officials said the cottages would do much to ease the shortage of tourist accommodations prevalent at the North Carolina entrance to the Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

N. C. State Offers Summer Courses

Four courses, lasting nine weeks, will be offered by the Engineering School, N. C. State College, beginning June 10 and ending August 9, 1946. The subjects to be offered include: Air Conditioning, Electric Refrigeration (Maintenance & Repair), Drafting (Highway), and Radio. Though the time allotted for these courses will not make experts in the several fields, it will give the student sufficient information to enable him to secure a position and to continue his study and advancement.
