THEATRES CAROLINA

Coming to the Carolina Theatre this Friday and Saturday (two days) is "These Wilder Years," starring James Cagney and Barbara Stanwyck with Walter Pidgeon and Don Dubbins.

This is a moving and outstandingly played drama of a man's search for the son he never knew. The story is razor sharp with human understanding and the direction gives the plot and players a sensitive touch that's quality all the way. It draws the parallel that the youth of today is very little different from the youth of yesteryear in regards to wildness.

Coming Sunday through Wednesday, August 12-15, with three shows Sunday at 3, 7, and 9, and week nights at 8:15, is the much heralded production "The Proud and the Profane," in VistaVision, and starring William Holden and Deborah Kerr, with Thelma Ritter, Dewey Martin and William Redfield in support.

In "The Proud and the Profane," the proved and prolific partnership of Perilberg and Seaton has brought forth another polished and well rounded candidate for awards in the pattern of their recent string which included "Little Boy Lost," "Country Girl" and "Bridges at Toko-Ri."

A deeply penetrating, incisive and perceptive love story told with taste, delicacy, good humor and sympathy, it is a candidate on a number of grounds—for sensitivity of direction by George Seaton who also contrived the carefully balanced screen play; for excellence of performance by the principals; and for performance by a supporting player, Thelma Ritter, which is short of dominating the picture only by the tiniest of margins.

Though beauty and acting ability seem the most obvious facets of the talent that has made Deborah Kerr Hollywood's most in-demand actress, those movie goers will agree that there is something more subtle contributing to her success.

It is the air of purity and the "untouchable" quality that seem to surround Miss Kerr that make the convention-defying imprudent love affair in "The Proud and the Profane" all the more powerful—the same attributes that intensified her memorable role in "From Here To Eternity."

Dramatically speaking, even the appearance of virtue is its own reward when you're Deborah Kerr.

'Not Work At All' Jean Safford Big Help To Father At Bay State Raceway This Season

Franklin Safford, who lives with his family on Midland Road and maintains one of the best stables in the South, has been considered for many years one of the top harness racing experts in the country.

This summer he and his daughter, Jean, have seen their horses win consistently at the Bay State Raceway in Foxboro, Mass.

Recently the Bay State Sulky News, published monthly during the season at the raceway, carried a feature story on Miss Safford. Pilot readers will be interested in learning the daily routine of a young lady who has an interesting hobby-job.

The article is reprinted in full: Successful father-son combinations have been fairly common in harness racing, but a father-daughter combination has been doing very well at Bay State Raceway this year.

Meet lovely 19-year-old Jean Safford, who takes great pride in her contribution to the successes of the Frank Safford stable of Pinehurst.

It's no minor contribution, either, because Jean is actually a second trainer for her veteran dad, and performs all the training functions except driving.

All this has come about in the last couple of years. Although she has been around horses all her life, it wasn't until two years ago that Jean exhibited any great interest in trotters and pacers. Prior to that she had concentrated her attentions on show horses, hunters and jumpers.

"It's hard to explain now," said Jean, "but I actually didn't have too much interest in harness racing until Dad handed me the reins one night and asked me to exercise a horse. I've been at it, more or less, ever since."

Jean was born in her dad's home town of Keene, N. H., but has lived in Pinehurst for the last ten years of her life. Even though she just graduated from Southern Pines High School last June, she has often been entrusted with the complete training of some of his horses when he had to be absent elsewhere.

How does a 19-year-old young lady like the rough and ready work associated with stables and paddocks?

"Oh, I love it! It's not like work at all," said Jean, "not like working in some old office job. Actually, I have been thinking about going to college and decided to take this year off and train horses for Dad and then make up my mind about college."

Here's a sample of the daily routine for Jean Safford: She and her Dad are on the track about 7 a. m. each morning exercising some of the 20 horses exercised in Bay State races.

Usually exercising takes up most of the morning, then there are harness repairs to be taken care of and other duties about the stables.

Jean's afternoons are usually free for swimming or tennis, but she's back in the paddocks at six in the evening to assist her father in preparing for the evening's races.

By the time the first race is ready to get under way at 8:15, Jean has taken her seat in the grandstand to root the Safford horses home.

"There are some drawbacks for a girl," admitted Jean. "Although I like traveling from place to place in the country, I find it's especially hard on clothes, the packing and unpacking. A fellow can get away with some slacks and a couple of sport coats, but a girl has to pack so much."

"I'm really enjoying it here in Foxboro this summer," she added. "This is a lot like home to me and everyone has been so nice."

What's in the future for Jean Safford?

"Well, for a long time I thought I'd like to be a veterinarian," she der his direction and we'll have others drive them for us."

If you're out early to the track some of these summer nights and you think you see a lovely young lady exercising trotters and pacers for that night's races, you're not seeing things. . . you're watching very capable Jean Safford, wearing the red and white silks of the Safford stable, getting them ready for her dad to handle at the starting gate.
