Industry

had, in turn, directed members of his committee to secure basic information that industry needs before it decides on a new location.

With the data on Southern Pines already assembled it will be no unsurmountable problem to get the other towns to undertake similar duties, Ostrom said. He was assured by the various representatives present that the other towns would have such information available at the next meeting, scheduled Monday at radio station WEEB.

Talking informally, the group cited several steps that would have to be taken by all the communities if their desire to obtain industry was sincere. Mentioned several times was the need for an educational program, a program that its backers said would build and develop a sound response to industry.

John Ponzer, industrial engineer for Carolina Power and Light Company, said that an educational purpose should serve a two-fold purpose: selling the community on industry, and selling industry on the community. Neither, he pointed out, should take precedence over the other.

Taking up from there Eutice Mills, Pinebluff mayor, said the group would need the backing of the entire county. "What we will desperately need," he pointed out, "is for everyone to stand up and be counted. We will have to take this program into every organized group in the county and do a hard selling group to many of them. Opposition to industry should show itself before we get too far along. If there is none, so much the better. But if there is we should at least know where to locate it."

Mayor C. E. Medlin of Aberdeen, hard hit recently by the announcement that the Amerotron Corp. textile plant there would close within the next few weeks, said the need for business over the Amerotron Corp. plant in Aberdeen before finally deciding on its location in Gastonia, it was learned here Monday.

Homelite, which like Amerotron is a member of the giant Textron family, took a look at the Aberdeen plant, even after plans had been firmly made to locate in Gastonia, but decided against it for a variety of reasons: not enough trained machinists in this area, air service is not up to the company's requirements, and the plant has a wooden floor.

is becoming "acute" in his town. He said the first order of business there was to help obtain a new operator for the mill, which has been the principle base for Aberdeen's recent growth. He pledged, however, the full cooperation of himself and others in Aberdeen in the county's efforts to develop an industrial program.

Archie Barnes, Carthage mayor, said he had talked to a number of people there and had found enthusiastic response to a program for luring new industry. He promised 100 per cent cooperation.

Jim Steed, representing Robbins, related the story behind the efforts of business and professional interests in Robbins in helping to establish a poultry processing plant which is expected to employ 200 people when in

Defeats Asheboro

In Homecoming Tilt

West Southern Pines, with Dock Kelly in the command post, defeated Asheboro in the Randolph County's school annual Homecoming game last Wednesday, 24-12.

Kelly completed a pass to Charles Parson on the West Southern Pines 30 in the first period to pave the way for the first touchdown. Parsons scored on the play but the attempt at the extra point failed.

Seconds before the end of the half Asheboro tied up the game on a six-yard plunge.

Early in the third period Kelly, on an optional play, got behind excellent downfield blocking to score West Southern Pines' second TD and send them out front full operation. "We did it," he said, "through strong community interests and the growing need for more sound economic growth. The plant will be a tremendous asset to us."

Though there was no identification offered, it was announced at the meeting that a business had offered to finance the printing of an industry brochure. Estimates have placed the cost of the project well in excess of a thousand dollars.

by 12-6. With just six minutes to play Asheboro scored on a series of passes, which were immediately followed by a series by West Southern Pines that resulted in their third TD. Kelly again passed in the waning minutes of the game to Parsons for the final score.
